Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, that is enough.

The SPEAKER. Provided it is within ten days of the end of the session.

The question was put on Mr. SCHENCK's motion to suspend the rules; and there were—ayes 65, noes 61.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended.

PAY OF JAMES H. BURCH, CONTESTANT.

Mr. KERR. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution to pay Mr. Burch, a contestant from Missouri, was defeated this morning.

Mr. PILE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not before the House. The House is engaged in considering the report of the committee of conference. Did the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] vote with the majority?

Mr. KERR. No, sir; I voted with the minority.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman cannot move to reconsider.

Mr. KERR. Then I will get some other gentleman to make the motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I voted with the majority, and I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected.

PAY OF CERTAIN HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. POMEROY. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to take up the time of the House in discussing the report of the committee of conference. It has been discussed fully by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McKEE] and others. I fully indorse their views and hope the report of the committee of conference will not be agreed to. I do not desire to say more on that subject, but will occupy the remainder of my three minutes in asking the House to pass a small resolution, if the gentleman from New York will allow me.

Mr. POMEROY. I must object to any resolution.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the gentleman will not object. It will take less time than the three minutes he has yielded to me. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper be instructed to retain in his service during the vacation of Congress all the crippled soldiers now in his employ.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not object to that.

Mr. BROOMALL. I object.

Mr. LOGAN. I will move to suspend the rules, and I will take but a moment to explain. There are four men employed here.

Mr. BROOMALL. I call for the regular order.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, just sit down and I will give you the regular order.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is this the regular order?

Mr. LOGAN. I have three minutes to talk, and I propose to talk.

The SPEAKER. If the point of order is insisted on, the gentleman from Illinois will have to move to postpone the consideration of the report of the committee of conference before he can move to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROOMALL. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I move to postpone the report of the committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move to suspend the rules to enable me to offer the resolution, and I will only say that there are three men here without legs or arms, and I wish them retained.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to suggest an amendment. It is simply that the Clerk be directed to pay these men the same pay they are now receiving during the vacation, and that they be allowed to go home during that period of time. I do not want to keep them here through the hot weather.

Mr. LOGAN. I accept that as a modification.

The question was taken on Mr. LOGAN's motion; and two thirds voting in favor thereof, the rules were suspended, and the resolution, as modified, was received and adopted.

Mr. LOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference upon the bill in relation to vacancies in the various Executive Departments.

Mr. POMEROY. I will, after a few remarks, ask the previous question, and endeavor to obtain a vote of the House upon this report. In answer to all that has been said by gentlemen in opposition to this report, I desire to say that not one of them, so far as I have heard, has controverted in the least the facts upon which the conferees base their report. The principal fact upon which this report is based is this: there are in the Patent Office four persons appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate for their peculiar knowledge and skill in the business of patents. The existing law provides that in case of a vacancy in the office of the principal one of those four officers his powers and duties shall devolve upon a mere clerk. That fact has not been controverted by any one.

Gentlemen ask if any accusations have been brought against the chief clerk of the Patent Office. I have brought none. Yet the House will bear me witness that within the last forty-eight hours the House has passed a resolution calling for an investigation into the matter of printing for that bureau, and that, too, upon a report made by a committee of this House. If gentlemen ask for charges, I refer them to that fact and to public rumor. Now, I do not propose in my place here, without any personal knowledge upon the subject, to charge any fault of omission or commission upon the present head of the Patent Office bureau. All I say is that he is not a man who was selected to discharge those duties, and if there have been any errors of omission or commission upon his part it is charitable to suppose that they result from his incompetency and nothing more.

Now, for the purpose of imposing the duties of this Commissionership while this vacancy shall continue upon the person who may be presumed to be best qualified of all to discharge them, and for the purpose of testing the sense of this House upon this report, I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 70.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. POMEROY called for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the report.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and upon a division there were twenty five in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question again recurred upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the report be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay the report on the table, if successful, will carry the bill with it.

Mr. POMEROY and Mr. WARD called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the report on the table.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were twenty-seven in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE and Mr. EGGLESTON moved that the House adjourn.

INDIANS AT FORT LARNED.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from E. W. Wynkoop, United States Indian agent, and the officer in command at Fort Larned, Kansas, relative to the assembling of large numbers of Indians at that post, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

KICKAPOO INDIANS IN MEXICO.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with inclosures from the Secretary of War and others, relative to certain Kickapoo Indians now in Mexico; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TRIAL OF UNITED STATES STEAMERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 8th instant, relative to the trial of the United States steamer Wampanoag, and vessels of that class, with reports thereon; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a memorial on behalf of the Indians by the Indian commission; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN TEXAS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House resolutions of the Texas constitutional convention, providing for selecting M. C. Hamilton and C. Caldwell to proceed to Washington and lay before Congress certain matters therein specified, accompanied by a report on lawlessness, &c., in Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

The question recurred on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. COBURN: A memorial of Thomas J. Pickett and others, citizens of Paducah, Kentucky, in relation to a claim of J. F. Wahl for damages.

By Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio: The petition of officers of the Army, asking for an increase of pay.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: A memorial of wine-growers of Ohio, protesting against a reduction of the tariff on wines.

By Mr. ELDRIDGE: Resolutions of the regents of the University of Wisconsin, for the same full pay and allowance to the Army officers detailed as teachers or instructors as they would be if on actual military duty.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of R. D. Mussey, late colonel one hundredth United States colored troops, asking that the proper accounting officers be directed to settle his accounts on principles of justice and equity.

By Mr. GETZ: Two petitions from citizens of Exeter, Oley, and Pike townships, Berks county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a new post route from the city of Reading, via Black Bear tavern, Oley turnpike road, and Manataurry post office, to Pike post office, in said county.

By Mr. HUNTER: The petition of Lot North, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana, asking relief for public moneys which were stolen from him on the 28th day of March, 1867.

By Mr. LAFLIN: The petition of H. A. House and others, of Jefferson county, New York, in favor of the imposition of an additional duty upon shingles imported from Canada.

By Mr. LOAN: A remonstrance of officers in the volunteer service of the United States against the passage of a certain Senate bill.

Also, the petition of citizens of Harrison county, Missouri, for a pension to Richard Lovelace, late a private in company G, forty-third infantry Missouri volunteers.

By Mr. LYNCH: The petition of W. & J. Drumond and others, ship owners of Maine, protesting against the passage of a bill in relation to the merchant marine of the United States.

By Mr. ROSS: A memorial on behalf of the Indians by the United States Indian commission.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of sundry officers of the Army, praying for the continuance of increased pay of thirty-three and one third per cent. or the passage of General SCHENCK's bill to fix and equalize the pay of officers, &c.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 21, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting communications in relation to certain Kickapoo Indians now in Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL.

Mr. HOWE presented a memorial of citizens of Wisconsin, praying for the extension of the time when the fifty per cent. clause of the thirty-third section of the bankrupt law shall take effect; which was ordered to lie on the table, the Committee on the Judiciary having reported on the subject.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the memorial of Edward D. Neill, praying for the publication of the records of the Virginia Company of London, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following petitions, memorials, and resolutions, remonstrating against the passage of an international copyright law, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

Six petitions of printers of Philadelphia;

Twelve memorials of the Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2;

A memorial of citizens of Massachusetts;

Two memorials of booksellers and paper-makers of Philadelphia;

A memorial of manufacturers and dealers in paper of the city of New York;

A memorial of paper-makers in Berks county, Pennsylvania;

A memorial of paper-makers in Manayunk, Pennsylvania;

Two memorials of Philadelphia Typographical Union No. 2;

A memorial of Boston paper manufacturers;

Two memorials of citizens of New York;

A memorial of citizens of Boston; and Resolutions of the National Typographical Union.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 127) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Dr. Isaac S. Hayes asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 167) for the relief of a certain United States Coast Survey officer. The joint resolution was read, and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 375) to repeal an act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to regulate the disposition of fines, penalties, and forfeitures received under the laws relating to the customs, and for other purposes," and to amend certain acts for the prevention and punishment of frauds on the revenue, and for the prevention of smuggling, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1428) authorizing the admission in evidence of copies of certain papers, documents, and entries, reported it with amendments.

Mr. TIPTON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 631) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Nebraska City, in the State of Nebraska, to intersect the Union Pacific railroad, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of James C. Pickett, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom were referred a great number of memorials, resolutions of States, &c., on the subject of post routes, have directed me to report them back, and ask to be discharged from their further consideration, inasmuch as a bill on that subject has been reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. RAMSEY. And if the Senate will indulge me, I should like to have the post route bill passed this morning. We shall have to pass it before we adjourn. It will occupy no more time than will be consumed in the reading of it. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the bill at the present time. Is there any objection?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to inquire of the Senator how much time it will occupy?

Mr. RAMSEY. Only the time spent in reading it. It is not very long. It is the usual post route bill at the end of the session, which will have to pass.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is it a House bill?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir. The committee of the Senate have reported a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not like to interpose, but it is absolutely necessary that I should call up an appropriation bill this morning.

Mr. RAMSEY. I shall assist the honorable Senator in getting up his bill as soon as this is disposed of. This will not occupy over fifteen minutes in reading and disposing of a few amendments that are to be offered, and it will then go to the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post roads.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert a substitute.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, but was interrupted by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. As that seems to be a very lengthy bill, and I suppose it has been printed and is lying on the table of every Senator, I do not think there is any object in reading it.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not of the slightest consequence to have it read.

Mr. RAMSEY. With the consent of the Senate, I will offer a few amendments at the request of Senators, and then let the bill pass without its reading.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The reading will be dispensed with, if there be no objection.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting under the head of "Missouri" the following:

From Trenton, in Grundy county, Missouri, via Edinburg, Grubb Town and Bolton, to Bethany, in Harrison county, Missouri.

From Tinney's Grove, in Carroll county, Missouri, to Utica, in Livingston county, Missouri.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend by inserting under the head of "North Carolina" the following:

From Fair Bluff to Conwayboro', thence to Bucks-ville and Georgetown, South Carolina.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend by inserting among the post routes of Pennsylvania the following:

From Sabinsville, in the county of Tioga, via Mix-town, to Ulysses, in the county of Potter.

From English Centre, in the county of Lycoming, to Morris Post Office at W. W. Babbs', in Morris township, in Tioga county.

From Alba, in Bradford county, to Fall Brook, in the county of Tioga.

From Fallen Timber, via Gill's Mills, Glen Connel, and Elders Mills, to Carrollton.

From the city of Reading, via Black Bear tavern, Olney Turnpike road, and Maxatawny Post Office, to Pike post office, in Pike township.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend by inserting under the head of "Oregon" the following:

From Fairfield, by St. Louis, Waconda, Parkers-ville, and Monitor, to Needy, (twenty miles.)

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That bill has not been read, and in my experience in the Senate it is the first bill that the Senate ever passed without being read. I think it had better be read. It has always been the practice to have every bill read.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well; let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill being called for, it must be read.

The Chief Clerk read the substitute reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 168) for the relief of John Montgomery; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

FOURTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to consider a resolution which I think will take but a moment—Senate resolution
No. 166—declaring the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment of the Constitution of the United States. It is lying upon the table.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will waive that for a moment to allow me to call up the bridge bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This resolution ought to be considered now. It will take no time, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to taking up the resolution mentioned by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to offer a resolution, if it is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let this be taken up first.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to offer a resolution at some time before the morning hour is over. I am not particular about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. This will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the resolution will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will change the form of the resolution, and make it a concurrent resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the Legislatures of the States of Connecticut, Tennessee, New Jersey, Oregon, Vermont, West Virginia, Kansas, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota, New York, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Maine, Iowa, Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, Alabama, South Carolina, and Louisiana, being three fourths and more of the several States of the Union, have ratified the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States duly proposed by two thirds of each House of the Thirty-Ninth Congress: Therefore, Be it resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That said fourteenth article is hereby declared to be a part of the Constitution of the United States, and it shall be duly promulgated as such by the Secretary of State.

The resolution was adopted.

PAY OF SOUTHERN SENATORS.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill
No. 622.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask permission to introduce a resolution. I suppose that is in order at this hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois objects.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask leave to offer a resolution.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator object?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object no further than that I wish to offer a resolution, and I want simply to do it during the morning hour. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the States of Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that ought to be referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Ohio will indulge me one minute I will state to him why I have offered the resolution. I find in the Journal of the Senate for the second session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress the following:

"Mr. Harris, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of the Senate in relation to the payment of the Senators admitted from the State of Tennessee at the last session of Congress, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the State of Tennessee the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress."

That resolution was offered on the 4th of February, 1867, was considered, and postponed until the 2d of March, 1867. On the 2d of March, 1867, the resolution came up again:

"On motion by Mr. SUMNER to amend the resolution by striking out the words 'commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress,' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'date of the resolution of Congress recognizing Tennessee as entitled to representation,' it was determined in the negative; and on the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the affirmative.

"So it was

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay to the Senators from the State of Tennessee the compensation allowed by law, to be computed from the commencement of the Thirty-
Ninth Congress."

That is what was done in precisely an analogous case, in the case of Tennessee, and on a report from the Judiciary Committee, which was made by Mr. Harris, then a member of the committee in this body, and adopted. A motion was made by the Senator from Massachusetts to limit the pay from the time the State was entitled to representation, and it was disagreed to by the Senate. We then passed directly on the question; and therefore I copied that resolution and offer it here to relieve the Secretary from embarrassment in regard to the pay of these Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. In an ordinary case I should interpose no objection to such a resolution as this; but I think there is some incongruity and some absurdity in the application of that principle to the cases that it is meant to embrace. According to the operation of that resolution, it would date back to a time when the office of Senator of those States was not in existence. What is the principle assumed by gentlemen? That until after the reconstruction laws were passed, and until Congress passed a law admitting those States to representation in Congress, there were no such States in the Union entitled to be represented in either House. Then it comes to this simple proposition: here are the States named which, at the beginning of this Congress, were not entitled to be represented in the Senate at all. That is the principle which gentlemen assume. When the States are afterward so rehabilitated as to be entitled to representation, the effect can only take place from the time that they were thus rehabilitated. When Senators from those States are afterward chosen, to pass a resolution declaring that those Senators shall be entitled to compensation for twelve months or more of time when there was no State that had a proper political being, and when there was no State that was entitled to representation upon the floor of the Senate, is absurd to the extremest degree.

I propose to amend the resolution by providing that it shall take effect from the time that the act of Congress declared those States to be entitled to representation in the two Houses of Congress. I propose that the operation of the resolution shall not go beyond that time. To reach beyond that time would violate all principle. It would violate all common sense. To be sure, it is not my common sense, because I believed that those States were States in the Union all the time; but then I have this other principle, that none of these gentlemen are the proper, constitutional Senators from those States, but that the men who came here with their credentials about two years ago were then, and are still, the legiti-mate and constitutional Senators from those States.

Mr. MORTON. I rise to a question of order.
I should like to know by what rule the consideration of the motion I had made was crowded out by the motion of the Senator from Illinois. I object to the present consideration of this resolution, until after the motion I made is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible for the Chair to determine what will be offered. The Senator from Illinois said he had something pertaining to morning business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The resolution does pertain to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The introduction of resolutions comes next, but not the consideration of them, and as the Senator from Indiana had a motion pending prior in time I suppose it ought strictly to be first put.
The Chair did not know that this would be a matter that did not pertain to the morning business. I think the Senator from Indiana is right in regard to the priority of his motion.
It is of the same class, this being entitled to no priority over it. At first blush the Chair supposed it had.

Mr. MORTON. Then I ask the consideration of the motion I made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana, under this ruling, asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 622) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river. Is there any objection? No objection being made, the bill is before the Senate.

IMPORTATION OF STEAM PLOWS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave now to make a report from the Committee on Finance. I did not wish to interrupt the motion of my friend from Indiana. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 754) to admit steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1868, to report it back without amendment; and I am also directed by the committee to ask for its consideration. If it is to be passed at all, it must be passed now. If any Senator upon the reading of the resolution objects, I shall not ask for its consideration. It simply proposes to permit steam plows to be admitted free of duty for one year. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution at this time. Is there any objection?

Mr. MORTON. If there is no debate on it,
I have no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to extend and continue in force the provisions of section two of the joint resolution approved March 26, 1867, respecting the importation of agricultural machinery free of duty for the further period of one year from the 30th of June, 1868, and any such machinery shipped before the 30th of June, 1868, or which may have arrived since that day, is to be exempt from duty.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 622) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to fill the blank in line ten of section one with the words "two hundred and fifty," and the blank in line thirteen with the word "five;" so that the clause will read:

All the spans, other than the one over the main low-water channel, shall be at least two hundred and fifty feet in length in the clear, and the span covering the main low-water channel of the river shall be of such length as to leave at least five hundred feet of unobstructed passageway of navigation at all stages.

Mr. CAMERON. I have a little business belonging to the morning hour, and I have been trying to get the floor, but I cannot get it up now on account of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator should have objected to the consideration of the bill. It is now too late.

Mr. MORTON. I hope that the Senate will proceed with the consideration of the bill now that it is up. The Senator's business will take no longer after this bill is disposed of than it will now.

Mr. CAMERON. I gave way yesterday, and I should like to call up a resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. POMEROY. I think there is some mistake about that being offered from the committee. I think that what the committee reported was different from that.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The committee did not report it. It is the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Perhaps the Chair was under a mistake in saying that the amendment was the report of the committee.

Mr. MORTON. It is the report of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it is the report of the committee.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to amend the amendment by filling the blank in the tenth line by inserting "two hundred and twenty," and filling the blank in the thirteenth line with "three hundred." I will give the reasons for this proposition as briefly as I can. I am sorry to occupy any time during the morning hour on any bill. If I did not believe conscientiously that this bill was a prohibition against bridging the river I would not say a word about it. For the first time in the history of our Congress in this country it is proposed to prohibit bridge building. I regard this bill without the amendment I have suggested as a prohibition. I regard it so in the first place from the fact that a five hundred feet span is an obstacle that has never yet been overcome in this country by bridges of the character required in this bill.

The committee have drawn this bill with a view of fixing a minimum, and then allowing the Secretary of War, under the advice of a corps of engineers, to fix the maximum; and yet—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator be kind enough to have that clause read? I did not hear it.

Mr. POMEROY. Yes, sir; I will read it. And yet in view of that fact the Senator from Indiana has moved that the maximum be put in as the minimum; that no bridge shall be of less span than five hundred feet in the main channel, from one end of the river to the other, whether the river has that width or not. That I regard as a prohibition against bridge building. The committee prepared the bill with the view that there should be a minimum, as I will read. It provides that—

All the spans other than the one over the main low-water channel shall be at least—feet in length in the clear, and the span covering the main low-water channel of the river shall be of such length as to leave at least—hundred feet of unobstructed passage-way for navigation at all stages.

The amendment, as moved by the Senator from Indiana, is to fill the one blank with three hundred feet and the other with five hundred feet. The amendment to the amendment is to make it conform to the existing law as a minimum exactly. The present law is that the spans approaching the main channel shall be two hundred and twenty feet and in the main channel three hundred feet. There are three bridges being built under the present law with that limitation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought it was two hundred and fifty for one.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe the law is three hundred feet.

Mr. MORTON. The report of the committee is that the main span shall be five hundred feet and the side spans two hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from West Virginia tells me that I am right, that the law is three hundred feet for the span over the main channel and two hundred and twenty feet for the arches that approach the main channel. Now comes this proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of War, after a full examination of each case as hereinafter provided, shall determine this width of passage adequate to the wants of navigation.

Here is a provision that allows the Secretary of War to decide each case upon its own merits. The third section reads as follows:

That any person, company, or corporation, authorized to construct a bridge across the Ohio river by the States upon whose territory said bridge will abut, shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination, a design of the bridge and piers, and a map of the location, giving for the space of at least one mile above and one mile below the proposed location, the topography of the banks of the river, the shore lines at high and low water, the direction of the current at all stages and the soundings accurately showing the bed of the stream, and shall furnish such other information as may be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject by the Secretary of War; and if the Secretary of War is satisfied that the provisions of the law have been complied with in regard to location, the building of the piers may be at once commenced, but if it shall appear that the conditions prescribed by this act cannot be complied with at the location where it is desired to construct the bridge, the Secretary of War shall detail a board, composed of three experienced officers of the corps of engineers, to examine the case, and may, on their recommendation, authorize the building of the bridge at the proposed location on such increased length of spans across the channel-way as the said board may deem sufficient to secure a passage-way that shall not unnecessarily obstruct the navigation of the river.

The meaning of the bill, as the committee reported it, is simply this: that the present law which requires a span of three hundred feet in the main channel, and two hundred and twenty feet in the spans that approach the main channel, shall be adhered to, unless they make out a case in each particular locality that satisfies the Secretary of War that the span ought to be longer; and if the board of engineers detailed for that purpose so report to the Secretary of War, he may increase the length of the span to any extent not limited in the bill. He may make it five hundred feet, or any other length that the board of engineers shall direct. I claim that that is a fair provision. In the first place the bridges already being constructed are being constructed under the law. While I have no interest in them, and do not know a friend on earth who has, yet I think justice should be done to them. Companies are now constructing bridges, and some of them have completed their structures under the law. Now, what is the use of requiring other structures to be five hundred feet on the same river, where the same class of boats have to pass, when you have three bridges of these dimensions already in existence or being constructed. Why is it that Congress is required as the minimum of the lowest span to put a lighter span than is known in this country to-day in successful operation anywhere? I am not ignorant of the fact that there is a suspension bridge at Niagara, but I am talking about bridges built with the truss or any other plan approved by railroad builders. The suspension plan has never been adopted by any engineers as a good system for railroads. There is but one in operation in this country, and that is at Niagara, of eight hundred feet span, and that was erected because no other bridge could be built there. You could not build up a temporary structure to put the truss bridge on at Niagara. You could not put any abutments in the center. A suspension bridge was the only kind of bridge that could be built there, and it answers a good purpose. It is at least better than none. By having a small pony engine, as they call it, and taking the trains apart, and going very carefully, it answers a good purpose of transportation; but not one would think of running over that bridge a train at full speed, with the ordinary weight of engines. It would be hazardous; it would be presumption. No careful, good engineer would think of it.

Now, as the suspension bridges are out of the question in this controversy it becomes a question whether we shall compel the arch or any other kind of bridge known as a railroad bridge to be built of a span of five hundred feet in the clear as a minimum. I say that such a provision is an obstruction to the erection of railroad bridges never known in this country before. The whole system, I suppose, is now in its infancy. The rivers were made to run to the south, but the immigration and travel, and commerce of this country go east and west to a great extent. When we lose sight of the Niagara river nearly all our other great rivers run to the south; that is the natural channel of commerce and trade. But we have been compelled to build artificial channels. The progress of empire has been westward no more and no less than the progress of our commerce and our freights and our traffic. We have been compelled to build artificial channels from the sea-board to the West. Shall they be obstructed when they come to the Ohio river by a bridge unknown to engineering, by a bridge that has never been made a successful experiment in this country? I apprehend the time will soon come when from the tide-water here at the Potomac, or Norfolk, we shall build artificial communications in the shape of railroads to the West. They can surmount the obstacle of the Alleghenies; they can surmount every obstacle known on the route until they come to the Ohio river, but the moment they approach the Ohio river they are to be met by an act of Congress, if this bill becomes a law, stating "no matter where you reach it, at the top or bottom, high water or low, broad channel or narrow, you must at least have a span of five hundred feet."

I submit to Senators whether that is not a prohibition of bridge building. There are experiments being tried in this country of a five hundred feet span; but there are none that have succeeded. We passed a bill a few days ago giving a company an opportunity to bridge the Mississippi river at St. Louis with a five hundred feet span, but that has never been indorsed by any experienced board of engineers. It is to be built on the plan known as Colonel Eads's plan, who, by the way, has gone to Europe and left his span—

Mr. MORTON. The Senator is mistaken about that. I inquired about that statement.

I am informed that is a mistake. The bridge is going on.

Mr. POMEROY. The philosophical principle of the arch in the plan of Colonel Eads will be found to be thus: he has a steel arch of five hundred feet, and the circle, of course, is much more than five hundred feet. Put it out in the sun, build it at any season of the year you choose, let the sun of to-day shine upon it, and it will expand and rise in the center eight inches. That will bring up the whole structure with it. If you build a truss bridge in combination with it, the moment the arch expands the whole weight of the bridge is drawn up into the air with that expansion. Let a train go on that truss bridge when it is thus expanded, and the whole weight goes on the arch, not the weight of the train simply, but the weight of the train and the bridge, and if the arch is not sufficient of itself to stand the weight, both of the bridge and the train, it will be crushed. Take it at another season of the year; let the arch contract; and then the whole weight is on the truss; and what is true of the arch when expanded is true of the truss when the arch is contracted. I know you can make an arch of wood that will support a truss. You have got them near Philadelphia and at other places, not to any such extent as five hundred feet, though; but a wooden arch that will not expand in the sun will be a support to a truss bridge, I have no doubt.

Now, sir, I fear that I shall be charged with some hostility to this bill, and with trying to defeat it in the morning hour. I said I would not extend my remarks. I believe religiously and conscientiously that this is a bad system of legislation; that it is a prohibition of bridge building on the Ohio river; that it is an untried experiment; that it is subjecting companies who propose building bridges over that river to unheard of expense. They estimate the cost of the bridge at St. Louis at many millions. They have called on the city of St. Louis to issue bonds to the extent of $4,000,000. I do not doubt that bridges of great capacity can be built if you will expend money enough; but to oblige every corporation, when there is no necessity for it, to expend from two to six millions is putting upon them a burden that they cannot and will not sustain, and it is a prohibition against the system of bridge building.

I believe that these lines of communication East and West should be fostered and encouraged by the Government, as well as the natural channels of immigration and business North and South. While I would not injure the navigation of the rivers, yet the navigation of all rivers is passing away. The steamboat business belongs to the day of the buried past. It is an antediluvian that talks about it. We have killed off nearly all the steamboats on our rivers by building railroads up and down their banks. It is the great interest of artificial commerce, that is commerce made by railroads, of which I am speaking; and I do not believe we have any right to crucify that interest for the benefit of any other, and especially for the benefit of an interest which is passing away. A few years from now and the steamboat business in this country on the rivers will hardly be recognized or heard of, except, perhaps, as floating down rivers heavy articles that cannot easily be handled in railroad cars or by railroad trains. I have only the interest in this subject that all Senators have, I suppose; but I believe we should put the minimum where the law now is, and let the Secretary of War, in each case made out on its own merits, extend the spans as high as he chooses. That is my belief.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas reminds me of an old friend of mine called Abraham Harnley. Abraham was a cousin of a distinguished individual of the last century called Rip Van Winkle. Abraham Harnley was very much in favor of a railroad from Harrisburg to Lancaster, of which I was the projector a good many years ago. I remember making a little speech in favor of railroads some thirty years ago. I said to the multitude assembled that I had no doubt there were plenty of people listening to me then who would live to see the day when they could start from Harrisburg to Philadelphia, one hundred miles, and get their dinner, and come back the same day; and it created wonderful enthusiasm. After the meeting was over Abraham Harnley came to me and he said, "Well, Mr. CAMERON, I'm right glad as you told those fellows about going to Philadelphia in a day and back; but"—putting his finger to his eye—"you and I knows better as that." [Laughter.]

Now, the gentleman's ideas about bridges and railroads go back to the day of Abraham Harnley. Why, sir, I remember perfectly well when Theodore Burr first invented the wooden arch. Men said that it was madness to think that you could make an arch of wood that would span a river; and when the first wooden bridge in America, indeed the first in the world, which was only about fifty years ago, was made, people said, "That man is crazy, and none but madmen would give their money to make a bridge over this terrific river"—the Susquehanna, which was three quarters of a mile wide at that place. Abraham Harnley, God bless him, is dead long ago; but now we can go from Philadelphia to Harrisburg two or three times a day and back, and two or times in the night, and we have no trouble about it.

Bridges began with an arch of one hundred and fifty feet. They have run them up to two hundred and sixty, and I believe to two hundred and eighty feet; some few to three hundred, upon the truss plan; but bridge building is still in its infancy, as railroads are yet in their infancy. Why, sir, the coal trade of the Upper Alleghany twenty years ago was not five hundred thousand bushels a year. It is now forty million bushels. In 1820 the whole anthracite coal trade of Pennsylvania was three hundred and sixty-five tons. Last year it was over twelve million tons, bringing a product in money greater, I believe, than all the gold of California. This has been the result in a little over forty years. In that time our people have made a railroad running from the Delaware river into the coal mountains, on which they have expended more than fifty million dollars with its branches. They have made a canal costing twenty or thirty millions, which is now a competitor of the railroad.

The gentleman talks about canals and rivers having done their duty. It is no such thing. For all time to come they will be used for heavy freights, because they will be less expensive, and of course more profitable to the owners of the products. We have in Pennsylvania more than a thousand miles of railroad under the ground; some of it two or three hundred feet below the surface; and they are going on improving all the time.

The gentleman tries to belittle the bridge at Niagara. It is eight hundred and thirty feet long. They use a pony engine, as he calls it, and I believe that is a technical term; but it is because they have plenty of time there. There is not much trade, but a great deal of travel; and it is perfectly safe. I do not remember the length of the bridge over the Alleghany at Pittsburg, but it crosses the Alleghany river about the center of the city, not by an arch, to be sure; it is a suspension bridge, and there is no reason why you cannot make a suspension bridge as strong as any other. Indeed, bridge builders think it is the strongest kind of bridge. It is not twenty-five years since the use of wire rope was first thought of in the world. It was invented a great many years ago, but it is not twenty-five years since the wire rope has been used in the arch, and it is now the great feature in the suspension bridge. We must look ahead, not look back. Men will never improve this country, they will never do for it what God intended should be done, if we look back all the time. We must look in advance, and we must be guided by science and learning and experience; we must get the benefit of all their researches in order to achieve the great results for which we are destined.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it is the duty of the Chair to call the attention of the Senate to the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. MORTON. I would say to the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] that I think we can soon get a vote on this bill, and I should be glad if he would allow the regular order to be passed over informally for a time.

Mr. CONNESS. If there is any prospect of coming to a vote on this bill I shall have no objection; but if it is going to lead to great discussion, of course I want to go on with the important measure which is the regular order.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to occupy but a minute or two further to show that bridges of long span have been made and are now in operation.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall not occupy any time unnecessarily; but I have some communications from engineers in this country and in Europe that I want to present. I shall not occupy a moment that I can get along without.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to make a suggestion to my friend from Indiana. It is apparent that this bill cannot pass, with the opposition to it, in the morning hour; and I suggest to him that if he will move a session for this evening he can get his bill then voted upon, and I think that will be the best plan. It is apparent that even by threatening discussion of a bill of this kind it can be put over in the day now.

Mr. POMEROY. I will vote for an evening session, and shall be glad to have the bill disposed of then.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will be done, because then there will be a certainty of getting a vote.

Mr. MORTON. Rather than take the risk of not having a quorum to-night I would prefer to have an understanding that after we dispose of the bill of the Senator from California this bill shall then come up and succeed it.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose there will be no objection to that.

Mr. MORTON. With an understanding of that kind I am willing that the Senate should go on with the bill of the Senator from California, and I hope it will not take a great while.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest to the Senator from Indiana, that he will probably find it impracticable to carry out any such understanding, because there is a large amount of executive business, and the Senate is very likely to go into executive session at an early hour to-day.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to interpose here to say that the Committee on Appropriations have an appropriation bill which ought to be presented to the Senate. It will not occupy many minutes, I think, but it is absolutely necessary that it should pass.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us dispose of this understanding first. Will the Senator from Indiana now make his motion for a recess?

Mr. MORTON. Very well; I move that the Senate at five o'clock to-day take a recess to meet at half past seven for the consideration of the bill we have had up this morning.

Mr. HOWE. I must appeal to the Senate at some time to give to the Committee on Claims an evening session, and I wish to put in my petition now that the Senate may dispose of their time in reference to it. It is entirely immaterial to me when I have it, but I want one some time.

Mr. POMEROY. Next week will do.

Mr. HOWE. I am afraid the Senator is postponing it a little to satisfy the purposes of the claimants. There are quite a number of House bills pending here which have been reported by the Committee on Claims that will not occupy a great deal of time. I was advised to ask for a session this evening.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The bridge bill will probably not occupy a great while this evening, and after that the chairman of the Committee on Claims may have a chance.

Mr. HOWE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate take a recess to-day from five o'clock to half past seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of considering this evening Senate bill No. 622.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senate will allow me, I wish to suggest that I think the first thing we ought to do is to go into executive session and dispose of the executive business as far as we can do so, if we wish to avoid being called together again after Congress has adjourned for the purpose of attending to executive business. We know that there are a great number of matters undisposed of in executive session and that may be disposed of in such a way as to require further action. There is a large mass of executive business pending, and we all know that it must be disposed of in some way before the final adjournment. If we do not dispose of the bulk of it very soon the result must necessarily be, as it seems to me, that the Senate will be obliged to stay here after the adjournment of Congress. I think, as all the bills which are absolutely necessary for carrying on the Government are either through or in their last stages, we can fix an early day for adjournment; and the first thing we should do, as I remarked before, is to attend to the executive business, and put it in such a train that it may be finished up.

With regard to these other matters that are before the Senate they are of a different character, and we may dispose of such of them as can be disposed of after we attend to the executive business. I do not feel disposed to interpose in this discussion and move an executive session; but it was my design at two o'clock to-day, unless there should be very good reason to the contrary, to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I only do so because, if I may be allowed to speak from the experience which I have had in this body, I think the result of delaying action on the executive business will be to protract the time that the Senate will be obliged to remain here to a period that will be disagreeable to us all. I mention now my intention to move an executive session at two o'clock so as to give fair notice.

Mr. CONNESS. I have only to say to the Senator from Maine that I am as anxious as he to do the executive business, and I believe that will be promoted by getting a few of the pending bills out of the way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They can be got out of the way after we fix the day of adjournment, which I think we ought to do.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say in addition to the Senator, and to the Senate, that we passed a very important joint resolution this morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. A concurrent resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That does not require the signature of the President, and there is nothing now, I understand, to delay us more than two or three days. I think we can adjourn on Thursday or Friday with ease if we will give our attention to business and take up first that which requires to be first attended to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I think this is a very proper time for me to say that the Committee on Pensions will want two hours or two hours and a half for the passage of the pension bills on the Calendar. They are about one third of all the bills that are there, but they can be got through with, I think, in that time. I should also say in reference to the bill lately pending, lest my silence should be construed to give assent to some remarks which have been made, that I have several amendments to offer to the bridge bill, let it pass in what shape it may. I also want to say that while I was speaking on Saturday the report about which so much has been said was laid on our tables, and this bill is not in accordance with the letter of General Warren contained in the report, and it has not the sanction, as to those questions that are contested, of the report of the committee.

Mr. MORTON. Is this in order? If this debate is in order I wish to be heard.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am stating what I am going to do about the bill to which this motion relates.

Mr. MORTON. That is not material.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion for a recess.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I have a right to show my reasons. Have I not a right to go on?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly, it is debatable.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I was about through. I only desire to say that as the letter of General Warren has been alluded to as giving sanction to this bill I want the opportunity to show the contrary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that at five o'clock the Senate take a recess until half past seven, for the purpose of considering Senate bill No. 622 this evening.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that vote is taken, I would make an appeal in the same direction with that made by the Senator from Maine. I am anxious that we should have an executive session. It is well known to the Senate that there are important matters there, some of which are already under discussion, which ought to be brought to a vote. How they may be determined remains to be seen. Suffice it to say they ought to be brought to a vote, and any pending discussion should have its natural course. That can be only by our going into executive session. I hope the Senate will kindly bear that in mind. I do not wish to press such a motion in any adverse way against other pending propositions; but I do most earnestly suggest to the Senate that at an early moment they should take such a motion into consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to—ayes twenty-nine, noes not counted.

MRS. GENERAL RICHARDSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is a bill granting a pension to the widow of General Richardson.

Mr. WILSON. I do not believe that will take five minutes, and we may as well pass it now.

Mr. THAYER. When I made the motion last evening to take up that bill, it did not occur to me that the bill for the protection of naturalized citizens abroad was the regular order. I do not wish to antagonize it against that; but there is an understanding between the Senator from California and myself which is satisfactory to him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That being the case, the unfinished business is House bill No. 768, concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States.

Mr. CONNESS. I consent to have that lie over informally, and proceed with the bill for the relief of Mrs. Richardson.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks that the unfinished business be passed over informally for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to have the bill amended so as not to relate back, so that the increase of pension may take effect from the date of the passage of the bill.

Mr. THAYER. This is a House bill, and it is placing this widow on the same footing with several others in like cases. This amount of pension has been granted to Mrs. Baker, widow of General Baker, who was really only a colonel when he was killed, to the widow of General Whipple, and to the widow of General Berry. The House of Representatives propose to place this case on the same footing with those, making the pension date at the same time. I hope the bill will be passed without any amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill by striking out, commencing in the seventh line, the words "3d day of November, 1862, on which day General Richardson died from wounds received in the battle of Antietam on the 17th day of September, 1862," and in lieu thereof to insert "date of the passage of this act."

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I should like to ask who reported that bill?

Mr. THAYER. It was reported unanimously from the Senate Military Committee. I desire to say that General Richardson was one of the most promising officers in the Army, and had he lived he would undoubtedly have been among the first in the Army to-day. I think this is a very slight recognition of his services, and he is lost to his widow and child.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Harlan, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, and Williams—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Connors, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Ferry, Harris, Howard, Kellogg, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Trumbull, Wade, Welch, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—34.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Cattell, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McDonald, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, and Saulsbury—20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This is one of a class of cases in regard to which several bills have been referred to the Pension Committee, and they have for the last two years uniformly reported against them, for the reason that they ask of Congress to give to the parties interested in the bills a pension larger than is allowed by law. They are confined mostly to the superior officers of the Army and Navy; and the Pension Committee have not felt it within their province to make new law; nor if the service were ever so exemplary have they felt that the means of information were within their power to determine that question. Latterly, at the request of those interested, several of these bills have been reported from the Pension Committee with a request to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Military Committee. That has been done, and I presume this is the first of the installment.

I call the Senate's attention to the fact that yesterday the chairman of the Military Committee offered an amendment to the bill then under discussion, the general pension bill, proposing to put all the cases of general officers and their widows on the same footing. That is to raise the rate of pension from thirty dollars, which is the highest for a lieutenant colonel and upward, in the case of a colonel five to thirty-five dollars; in the case of a brigadier general to forty dollars; and in the case of a major general to fifty dollars a month. I am willing to concede that the services of our generals, and especially of those who were killed in battle, were as meritorious as any one can claim for them; and no doubt the poor bereaved widow may consider that she has some special claim on the Government because she has lost her husband, and she may suppose that his exertions were greater than those of any one else. If it had been the pleasure of the Senate and of the other House to pass a bill increasing the pensions of the widows of general officers, I should have acquiesced, and such bills would have been attended to in the Pension Committee; but after the refusal of the Senate to do that yesterday, I must object to making fish of one and fowl of another. I must object to picking out the widows of particular officers in order that this increase of pension may be given them. I think it is unjust; it will crowd the Calendar with similar applications from others; and I would much prefer to see the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts substituted for this bill than to vote for the bill as it stands.

The Pension Committee took occasion in a written report to explain their reasons pretty much as I have done now, for their action in the premises. That report was in the hurry not read to the Senate. I have thought it, therefore, due to the committee to state their reasons for this refusal. They do not believe that it was ever intended that they should make law. Their duty is and their wish is to see that every person to whom the laws intend to give a pension gets it and shall not be deprived of it by technical decisions of the Pension Office or any other outside consideration. But to take up the cases of the widows of general officers in detail, and to give to some pensions larger than the law allows, when many are content with the pension the law has given them, it appears to me is an injustice on its face, and I would rather it should not be done.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I wish to say a word in relation to this bill and the one which follows it that is reported by the same committee, and which I hope will be taken up as soon as this is disposed of. I have given this subject some attention. It appears that this legislation commenced by giving widows of generals who were killed on the battle-field an increase of pension of twenty dollars a month, raising their pensions from thirty to fifty dollars; and you will now find on the statute-book thirteen cases which have already been provided for. This increase of pension has been given in thirteen cases, and there are now but two or three unprovided for. The widow of General Richardson and of General Wallace, whose case comes up in the next bill, are, I believe, the only widows of generals who were killed in actual battle now unprovided for. When we shall have passed these bills, we shall only have put them on equality with widows of other generals who died in battle. This is the end of these appropriations; this equalizes them; and there certainly can be no objection to that. There can be no objection, surely, to allowing this increased pension to date from the time the officer fell on the battle-field, instead of from the passage of the act. That has been settled in several cases.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FOURTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a telegraphic dispatch from Governor Bullock, of Georgia, announcing the ratification of the fourteenth amendment and of the fundamental conditions prescribed by Congress by the Legislature of Georgia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate, declaring the ratification of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

MRS. GENERAL WALLACE.

Mr. YATES. I have had a consultation with the Senator from California, and I desire, with his consent, to have the Senate act on the bill for the relief of General Wallace's widow. I think it will lead to no debate. It involves the same principle as the bill just passed, and it has been reported by the Military Committee. I hope the Senate will allow it to pass.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Martha Ann Wallace was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to place on the pension-roll the name of Martha Ann Wallace, widow of the late Brigadier General W. H. L. Wallace, at the rate of fifty dollars per month, from the 10th day of April, 1862, and to discontinue the pension heretofore allowed her under general law.

Mr. CAMERON. I am opposed to the passage of this bill. It is the beginning of a great addition to our pension-list.

Mr. CONNESS. That has been settled in the other bill just passed.

Mr. CAMERON. I was not in when that was passed, and I desire to oppose the principle now. We shall have at least four hundred such cases if we pass this bill. Six have already been passed, having got through Congress by inattention or something of that kind. The pension laws already provide thirty dollars a month for the widow of every officer above the rank of major. It is now proposed to give an increase of pension on the pretext that the officers died on the battle-field. The same reason will apply, as I am informed on the best authority, to at least four hundred more cases, or perhaps eight hundred, if you include all the colonels and majors. This case ought not to be passed on by itself. There ought to be a general law on the subject of pensions. If we are going to increase the pensions of a few widows, why not give the increase to all in like position? Just now, I understand you passed a similar bill, while I was out, for a lady who is now receiving $900 a year from the Government. You give her a pension of $600, so that she gets $1,500 a year from the Government.

Mr. CONNESS. I must just say enough to say that I protest against this idea. A lady who is employed every day and receives less than men who are employed in the same business, cannot be said to receive anything from the Government. She receives a small compensation for her labor, and that should not be charged to her account.

Mr. CAMERON. The policy of giving pensions is to give them to those who are unable to take care of themselves. A pension is not so much a reward for public services as it is an evidence of gratitude on the part of the Government and the people to the unprotected heirs of gallant men. I have no objection to making the pensions as high as you please; I do not care how much you give; but I want your laws to be general. I know hundreds of cases myself of gallant colonels in my own State, and the adjoining States, who died in battle, many of whom left their families poor, and their widows only get what the law allows, thirty dollars a month. Why give more in a few special cases, because the husbands happened to die on the battle-field? Every one who was wounded so as to die from the wounds received during a battle will be construed, after a while, as having died on the battle-field? We are too apt to be governed by our feelings. I do not object to that; I think it is creditable that everybody should have generous and kindly feelings; but we ought to remember, at the same time, that we are trustees here. Where is the gentleman in the Senate who would put his hand in his own pocket and give to these widows and heirs of worthy and gallant soldiers his own money? We have a right to be generous with our own, but the public money is a trust placed in hands, and it is wrong to make these invidious distinctions. I said there were four hundred such cases. There are certainly hundreds of people just as worthy as this lady is of the patronage and favor of the Government. I think we ought at least to wait awhile and think about it; and if these pensions should be increased let us do it in a general law. If this bill passes, I shall, at some proper time, move to include the widows of officers, from the rank of colonel up, who died on the battle-field. My objection is to special legislation of this kind.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARITABLE APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MORTON. There is another case reported by the same committee at the same time. I desire to call up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Hackleman. It will take but a moment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to renew my statement to the Senate. The Senate proposes to go into executive session. I understand. We have a bill here of a general character which ought to go to the other House; and I hope my honorable friend from Indiana will allow his bill to go over until the evening; he will then have the opportunity to call it up.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the regular order. I think that is the best thing. Let us get a vote on it, and that will clear it out of the way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that the regular order be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 541.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will not make that motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is no probability of getting a vote on the bill which is the regular order.

Mr. CONNESS. I have this to say: the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] says, "Get a vote on the appropriation bill," and at the same time he has given us notice that he will ask for an executive session at two o'clock. If the Senate will consent to vote on the bill which I am pressing on the attention of the body I have no objection; but I hope we shall get a vote on it to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not desire to have the whole day spent on that bill. I said in my seat that I had no objection to the appropriation bill being considered and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him; but prior to that the Senator from Indiana moved to take up a bill.

Mr. MORTON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now, I want to say that this bill ought to pass. It must have the consideration of the House of Representatives. It ought to pass now or very soon. If the honorable Senator from California could get his bill passed at once of course I would not interpose this bill; but if that bill, having exhausted two days, is to exhaust another day, I must object.

Mr. CONNESS. Well, I reply to the Senator that I will consent to let it go over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have not got through.

Mr. CONNESS. I say I consent to let the bill go by for the present.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If that is agreeable to the Senator, I accept the proposition.

Mr. CONNESS. That will be agreeable.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well.

Mr. CONNESS. We can pass the bill while we are talking about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.]

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate for the support of the institution, in addition to the existing appropriation to meet the increased expense of maintaining pupils whose admission was authorized by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1867, $3,000; for continuing the work upon buildings of the institution, in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, $48,000. In addition to the directors whose appointment has heretofore been provided for by law, there are to be three other directors appointed, as follows: one Senator by the President of the Senate, and two Representatives by the Speaker of the House; these directors to hold their offices for the term of a single Congress, and to be eligible to a reappointment. No part of the real or personal property now held or hereafter to be acquired by the institution is to be devoted to any other purpose than the education of the deaf and dumb, nor is any portion of the real estate to be aliened, sold, or conveyed, except under the authority of a special act of Congress. The bill further proposes to repeal so much of the act of February 16, 1857, as allows the payment of $150 per annum for the maintenance and tuition of each pupil admitted by order of the Secretary of the Interior, and the number of students in the collegiate department from the several States, as authorized by the act of March 2, 1867, is to be increased from ten to twenty-five in number.

The Committee on Appropriations proposed to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the purposes hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869:

Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia:

For the support, clothing, medical, and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane, including $500 for books, stationery, and incidental expenses, $90,500.

For finishing, furnishing, lighting, and heating the unfinished part of the east wing of the main hospital edifice, $7,000.

Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb: For the support of the institution, including $1,000 for books and illustrative apparatus, $25,000.

For the proper inclosure, improvement, and enlargement of the grounds of the institution, in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, $5,600.

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum:

For the support of the asylum over and above the probable amount which will be received from independent or pay-patients, $15,000.

For the completion of the Providence Hospital in Washington city, District of Columbia, $30,000.

For the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, $10,000.

For care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether in any appropriation bill the ordinary appropriations have been made which we yearly make for Providence Hospital?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The ordinary appropriation is in this bill—no extra appropriation.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time and passed, and its title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

IMPROVEMENT OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill of the House (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of navigation of the Mississippi river, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment to said bill.

ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
JAMES HARLAN,
C. R. BUCKALEW,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

I. DONNELLY,
HORACE MAYNARD,
L. W. ROSS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOWE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 5, 9, 10, 11, 24, 26, 29, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 40, 44, 45, 47, 50, 51, 60, 62, 63, 66, 67, 69, 71, 72, 73, 75, 76, 77, 79, 88, 92, 104, 106, 109, 114, 120, 121, 123, 124, 125, 127, 128, 132, 133, 137, 139, 141, 142, 143, 148, 149, 150, 156, 158, 170, 172, 174, 175, 184, and 186.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 38, 39, 46, 48, 49, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 61, 64, 65, 68, 70, 71, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 89, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 105, 108, 110, 113, 115, 116, 117, 126, 129, 130, 131, 134, 135, 138, 140, 145, 156, 161, 162, 168, 169, 171, 176, 180, 181, 182, 183, 185, and 188, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out in line two of said amendment the word "sixteen;" and insert in lieu the word "thirteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "twenty-five hundred;" and insert in lieu the following words: "twelve hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twelfth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment "thirty-six thousand five hundred;" and insert in lieu "twenty-five thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the following words: "for the Bois-Port band;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the following words: "for the Bois-Port band;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line five of said amendment strike out the word "fifteen;" and insert in lieu the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-first and forty-second amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendments and insert in lieu of both amendments the following words:

"To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to complete the removal of the scattering bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota to their reservations near White Earth lake and to assist them thereat for the period of six months, this amount is hereby appropriated, which, added to the unexpended balance of any appropriation heretofore made for the same purpose, will enable said Commissioner to pay to each member of such bands the sum of ten dollars in money and twenty dollars in rations, such as are furnished the Army of the United States; such payment and delivery to be made only to such individuals of the bands as shall remove themselves to their reservations prior to the 1st day of December next, $40,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line four of said amendment, strike out the word "ten;" and insert in lieu the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "five;" and insert in lieu the word "four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "six thousand seven hundred;" and insert in lieu the words "five thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "four;" and insert in lieu the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "seven thousand six;" and insert in lieu "five thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line nine of said amendment strike out the word "four;" and insert in lieu the word "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninetyeth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "nine hundred;" and insert in lieu "seven hundred and twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninety-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "nine hundred;" and insert in lieu "seven hundred and twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: after the word "cents," in line fifteen of said amendment, insert the following words: "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" and strike out all after the word "sell," in line twenty-one of said amendment, down to and including the word "treaties;" in line twenty-five, and insert in lieu the following words: "six hundred twenty-one hundred and eighty-eight parts of the several classes of bonds held by him in trust for said Pottawatomie Indians, and pay the proceeds thereof without any deduction, in compliance with the provisions of said treaties;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and eleventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words: "four thousand six;" and insert in lieu "three thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and twelfth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words: "which amount shall be deducted from any money or funds belonging to said tribe of Indians;"

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and eighteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line seven of said amendment strike out the words "twenty-five;" and insert in lieu the word "fifteen;" and at the end of said amendment add the following words: "to be expended under the direction of Rev. H. B. Whipple, of Faribault, in the State of Minnesota;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and nineteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: in line four of said amendment strike out the word "fifty;" and insert the word "thirty;" and after the word "dollars," in the same line, insert the following words: "to be expended under the direction of Rev. H. B. Whipple, of Faribault, in the State of Minnesota;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and twenty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line two of said amendment strike out the words "four thousand six;" and insert in lieu "three thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and thirty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "seventy;" and insert in lieu the word "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and twenty-fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "fifty;" and insert in lieu the word "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-sixth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "five," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out of said amendment the word "twenty;" and insert in lieu the word "five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fifty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out of said amendment the words "fifty-five;" and insert in lieu the word "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, numbered one hundred and fifty-two, one hundred and fifty-three, one hundred and fifty-four, and one hundred and fifty-five, and agree to the same, with the following amendments: strike out all of said four amendments, and strike out also lines twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five, and twenty-six of the bill on page 54, and insert in lieu the following words: "For pay of one physician, $1,200; one blacksmith, $750; one assistant blacksmith, $500; one farmer, $720; one teacher, $750; and one carpenter, $720, upon each of the reservations in California; and one miller, at $750, upon each of the Round Valley, and Hopca Valley reservations;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fifty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line six of said amendment, strike out the word "fifty;" and insert in lieu the word "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fifty-ninth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "five thousand;" and insert in lieu the words "three thousand and five hundred;" and at the end of said amendment add the following words: "and the Smith river reservation is hereby discontinued;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixtieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment and substitute in lieu thereof the following: "For amount of deficiency expended in subsisting the Navajoes at the Bosque Redondo, according to the contract made by Theodore H. Dodd, from the 22d of May, 1868, until their removal to their old homes, $21,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, at eleven cents per ration;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: in line four of said amendment after the word "dollars" insert the following words: "to be expended under the direction of Lieutenant General Sherman, of the Indian peace commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 164, 165, 166, and 167, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said four amendments and insert in lieu the following words: "For constructing warehouse, agency building, blacksmith and carpenter's shop, and school-house, per article three of said treaty, $12,500, to be expended under the direction of Lieutenant General Sherman, of the Indian peace commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and seventy-third amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "eighty-five" and insert in lieu the word "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and seventy-seventh, one hundred and seventy-eighth, and one hundred and seventy-ninth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said three amendments, and insert in lieu of said amendments the following words: "For this amount for the purpose of carrying out the treaty stipulations, making and preparing homes, furnishing provisions, tools, and farming utensils, and furnishing food for such bands of Indians with which treaties have been made by the Indian peace commission, and not yet ratified, and defraying the expenses of the commission in making such treaties and carrying their provisions into effect, $500,000, to be expended under the direction of Lieutenant General Sherman of said commission, and drawn from the Treasury upon his requisition upon the Secretary of the Interior;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and eighty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: strike out all after the word "acres," down to and including the word "office," and at the end of said amendment add the following:

Provided further, That all improvements made by any person on said reservation before the passage of this act shall be the sole property of the person making them, who shall have priority of purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land covering and adjoining said improvements, and all said land shall be sold and disposed of for money only.

T. O. HOWE,

J. B. HENDERSON,

L. M. MORRILL,

Managers on the part of the Senate,

B. F. BUTLER,

W. WINDOM,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COLE. Is it in order to move for the printing of this conference committee report, and of the bill as amended, before the Senate act upon it? If so, I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order, but the report of a committee of conference cannot be amended.

Mr. COLE. I am aware of that fact, but I should like to look over the report in order to know what we vote upon, and I am sure it is quite impossible to understand what we are doing in voting for concurrence in this conference report without seeing the bill as the report amends it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, that the report of the conference committee, together with the bill, as amended, be printed.

Mr. HOWE. I hardly think it is worth while to make that order. It is true there were a great number of disagreements which were submitted to the committee, and I do not suppose the Senate understand very distinctly the particular action of the committee on each particular disagreement; but it must be manifest to the Senate as it was to the committee that with reference to very much the largest number of these disagreements there was no special feeling, and the disagreement was more a matter of form than anything else. I incline to think, although I do not pretend myself to be very familiar with the report we have made, that I can give to the honorable Senator from California any information he may need upon any particular question if he is in doubt.

Mr. COLE. I am satisfied that in this bill if it pass as it has been fixed by the conference committee, there will be perpetrated very great injustice, and especially gr-at injustice toward the part of the country that I have the honor in part to represent. The bill as passed by the House of Representatives contained appropriations amounting to $2,214,233. The Senate Committee on Appropriations changed the bill so far as to add to the gross amount $96,790; so that the bill as reported to the Senate contained appropriations amounting to $2,311,073. I do not assert that these figures are entirely accurate; but though going over the bill rather hastily I feel sure they will not be found far from the true amounts. Of these appropriations those that are made for the States and Territories that are still, to a great extent, under the control of the Indians—I mean the Territories and States west of the Rocky mountains, including California, Utah, Oregon, Washington Territory, Nevada, Idaho, and Arizona—the amount in all is but $207,367, as footed up at the time the bill was in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STEWART. How much of that was for Nevada?

Mr. COLE. The amount for Nevada was $20,000. It will be seen that the total amount of appropriations for that vast country west of the Rocky mountains, in which in my estimation are to be found full half the Indians of the whole country, is only about one tenth what they are for the country this side of the Rocky mountains.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator from California if he has also a list of the number of treaties. There are a great many more treaties east than west.

Mr. COLE. This large amount of upward of two millions that is appropriated for Indians this side of the Rocky mountains is most of it obtained through the shallow pretense of Indian treaties. The first fifty or sixty pages of the bill are devoted to making appropriations under sections of particular treaties with Indians and treaties with Indian tribes of which in many instances scarcely a shadow or skeleton is left. By this shallow pretense a very large amount is appropriated for the Indians nominally this side of the Rocky mountains. For the purpose of keeping peace and protecting the white settlers, the miners and farmers, west of the Rocky mountains, there being few treaties there, a very small appropriation indeed is made. This is the injustice that I complain of, and it appears glaringly upon the face of this bill.

Mr. President, in my own State, according to the last report from the Department, I find that the Indians numbered twenty-five thousand nine hundred and sixty-two; and besides these there are many wild Indians that could not be numbered. I believe the whole number there exceeds thirty thousand Indians. Those Indians are scattered over two hundred thousand square miles, over a territory nearly five times as large as the great State of New York. The white population in that country is but sparse; they are interspersed with the Indians over the whole State. Necessarily the two races mingle with each other. The miners of our country necessarily penetrate the Indian country. They come in contact with them, and the destruction of the one race by the other is going on constantly and is the subject of daily repeated complaint from that section. These facts have been totally disregarded by the conference committee. We only asked so much as we could get along with, the least sum possible to preserve peace as we believe. We hope still that with the small appropriations that have been made, we may be able to pacify the Indians and prevent their depredations; to prevent loss of life on the part of the white race, as well as on the part of the red race; but it is hardly to be expected that this condition of peace can be maintained with the inadequate appropriations that have been made by this conference committee.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to ask the Senator whether it is not true as a general statement that the Indians of the Pacific slope are much less warlike than those further east, and that there is therefore less necessity for expending funds to avoid Indian wars there?

Mr. COLE. I think that is not the case. On the contrary I believe the reverse to be the case. I believe there are no Indians more formidable than some of the tribes in the northern part of California, none more formidable this side of the Rocky mountains than the Apaches of Arizona, none more formidable in war than some of the tribes of Oregon and Idaho. I believe that the Indians on the other side of the mountains are as a general thing quite as formidable in war as the Indians on this side of the mountains and as difficult to pacificate. There is, however, some portion of the Indian race on the other side of the mountains that are peaceful. I refer now to the Indians in the southern portion of California and in the western portion of Arizona. Those in the southern portion of California were during early times under the care of the benevolent Catholic priesthood. They belonged to the old missions of that country, and being kept under control by the priesthood were partially civilized; and at this time if they had been left alone and not interfered with by the white race, they would have been in a tolerably prosperous condition. They owned stock, horses, cattle, and sheep; they had vines and orchards planted, and were getting along with some degree of prosperity; but we in the West are too well aware of the fact that there is a class of people who have no regard whatever for the rights of the Indians, no matter how far they may have been advanced in civilization; and in California the emigrants from the western States, the southwestern States, and from Texas in particular, enter the southern portion of our State, and frequently without paying the least regard to the rights of the Indians drive them from their rancheros, drive them from their vineyards, and deprive them of their cattle and other property. The five or ten thousand Indians in the southern portion of the State of California are at this time in great distress because of this interference with them, and they receive no care, or next to no care, from the General Government.

I will add that, as might reasonably be expected, depredations are being committed by them; they are driven to it from their necessities; they are driven to it from hunger, and not unfrequently they destroy the lives of the settlers and take their property, and no protection whatever is afforded the white race as against these depredations. To be sure, some few of the white race that have thus crowded the Indians from their homes deserve no protection; but the Indians do deserve protection as well as the rest of the white people. These Indians have been grossly maltreated; they have been basely imposed upon, and they are now left without protection by Congress.

I felt bound, Mr. President, to say what I have in some degree to relieve myself from the responsibility which must fall upon somebody for what is likely to occur during the next year or until Congress does take some steps for the protection of that race as well as our own. I regret exceedingly that in the committee that has made the bill, because it is made by the conference committee, there was no one from the west side of the Rocky mountains, no one who was well acquainted with the condition of these Indians. I think such should have been the case; but it was, of course, a mere oversight. I am not finding fault with the Presiding Officer of either House by any means, because I did not apply to either of the Presiding Officers to have some one from the Pacific coast or west of the Rocky mountains put upon this committee. I am satisfied, however, that some members of the committee have but a very inadequate appreciation of the true condition of things in the land of which I speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the amended bill, together with the report of the committee of conference, to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CORBETT. I have received a letter from one of our Indian agents, one of our best on the Pacific coast, this morning, relative to a matter in regard to which I had written him when the House of Representatives struck out the appropriation "for expenses of removal and subsistence of Indians, not parties to any treaty, in Oregon and Washington Territory, and for pay of necessary employes, $50,000." That was stricken out in the other House. That appropriation has been made heretofore for the subsistence of Indians with whom no treaties had been confirmed, and one half of the amount, $25,000, has gone to the support of one Indian agency principally, the agency from which I received this letter. The conference committee have inserted $20,000 instead of $50,000, thus allowing only $10,000 for this agency, with between two thousand eight hundred and three thousand Indians, or, perhaps, a larger number, because there are probably some at Klamath lake, to which it applies, which I did not mention before the conference committee. I will read the letter which I have received from this Indian agent:

"Your letter of May 30, is received and read with great interest. I confess I am very much surprised at the course pursued by the House in reference to our Indian appropriations in Oregon. While I fully appreciate the necessity of retrenchment in Government expenditures, I am equally aware of the impropriety of attempting it in the direction referred to. You are correct as stated in your letter that the amount stricken from the appropriation is the principal fund out of which I pay my employes; in fact the agency cannot be run without it. I presume of course it will or has been reinstated in the bill. I sent a dispatch inquiring whether it had passed or not, as I should of course have to stop operations and discharge my employes. I have received no reply. Now, just think for a moment of the result of such a course. The Indians of course would leave and go into the mountains and renew their old customs of stealing and killing. Then we would have another war that would likely cost $500,000 besides the loss of many lives. I am confident that if the Siletz and Alsea Indians were turned loose that we would have serious trouble with them inside of ninety days. If they are kept where they are and treated half right for a few years more they can take care of themselves in a great measure."

I submit this letter to the Senate, as I consider it my duty to do. Not far from this agency there was formerly established a military post for keeping these Indians in subjection. They were some of the most warlike people on the Pacific coast, and the war with them cost about five million dollars. They are supported now upon this agency at an annual expense of less than twenty-five thousand dollars, because a portion of that sum goes to other Indians. If you refuse to appropriate that you will force the agent to give up this reservation and turn the Indians loose upon the whites, which will probably involve us in war at an expense of perhaps a million of dollars. I submit this to the Senate that they may take such action as they think best.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will state in a few words that there has been a reduction of the appropriations west of the mountains, but, perhaps, not to the extent thought by the Senator from California, [Mr. COLE.] I objected to that reduction. The principal reduction made in the bill is for current and contingent expenses in the different Territories and States west of the mountains. I thought that it was bad policy to do that, but I was overruled in the committee. I can appreciate very well the remarks made by the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from California; but if they will examine the bill they will find that the reduction is very small. It does not amount to much. The objection, if any, that I have to the report is that it has cut down the appropriations in small particulars where I thought it was very bad policy to do so; for instance, in the wages of teachers, of millers, of engineers, &c. I believe that those persons cannot be employed at the prices fixed in the report.

I will state, however, that the report, as it now comes in, appropriates equally as large an amount, if not a larger amount, than the bill did when it went to the committee of conference.

Mr. CORBETT. Not to the Pacific coast.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; but generally. Since the bill was sent to the committee of conference, we received information from the peace commission in regard to the treaty concluded with the Sioux Indians, twenty-five or thirty thousand of them upon Powder river, and the Crow Indians, and the Bannocks and others of Idaho, contemplating a removal, and fixing them upon the Missouri river, where it is supposed they will be able to cultivate the land and make a living for themselves; and hence it became necessary to make a large appropriation under the advice of the Indian peace commission. I believe it will prove to be the very best possible appropriation that can be made. It has become necessary to make this large appropriation in order to keep peace upon the Powder river, and in Montana and Idaho. It is true that in reference to the western slope heretofore the Indians have been peaceable; they have not given us much trouble in warlike operations against the whites, and Indian affairs in California and in Oregon have been very well managed. We have been fortunate in getting good agents and good superintendents, and the management of affairs there has been better than it has been east of the Rocky mountains. That is my impression from a careful examination of the whole subject, and I regret very much that the appropriations in the West are reduced. They are also reduced in small matters in the East.

I beg to suggest further to Senators from the West that it will be better to adopt the report as it is. I have sympathized with their views upon the subject, as the Senate very well knows. I do not believe that it is good policy to expend eighteen or twenty million dollars in the War Department instead of expending four or five hundred thousand dollars in the civil department of the Government. I know there is a great deal of prejudice against the administration of affairs in the Interior Department. It may be corrupt, or it may not be. It is asserted to be corrupt, but I have found no evidence of this alleged corruption, and it has been my duty to give some attention to it. Although I have heard it stated over and over again, I have been utterly unable to discover it. If I could, no man would be more willing than myself to root it out, and I should be very far from granting any appropriation whatever to pass into its hands.

I know that it has been said that the committee in their report reflect upon the Interior Department by putting the appropriation for the removal of the Sioux in the hands of General Sherman. Without intending to reflect upon the Department in any way, we thought that if the removal was made at all it must be made by the military, and we simply meant to say that General Sherman can do this thing better than the Interior Department. That was the opinion of each and every member of the committee, without intending by that action to reflect at all upon the entire Department. Some other appropriations have been stricken off in the shape of deficiencies. Those appropriations will have to be made hereafter on other bills, at the next session, probably. I suppose that in a great many instances where appropriations have been stricken off we have not rid ourselves of them, but at another session, or upon a deficiency bill at the present session, we shall be compelled to appropriate for them.

Now, Mr. President, inasmuch as there is but a short time between this and the next session, I suggest to my friends that it will be better in this warm weather to let the bill pass through, and provide at the coming session of Congress for the difficulties which they present. It can be done at an early period of the session, and I promise them, so far as I am concerned, to give it early attention. I think the appropriation here made will save us from the difficulties contemplated on their part until the beginning of the next session of Congress, and perhaps it would be a great deal better to let the bill pass as it is, and not now to disagree with this report, and undertake to get a better one.

Mr. RAMSEY. Among the other extraordinary provisions of the report of this committee of conference, in addition to placing the charge of the western Sioux with a general of the Army, and devolving on him the expenditure of a large fund which is to be placed entirely in his control, the Sioux of the East are to be placed in charge of a bishop of the Episcopal Church. Civilians seem to be entirely in the vocative in the judgment of this conference committee. I believe the officers who have charge of the Sioux at Lake Traverse and Devil's lake are honest men. Certainly they are men of very large experience in the management of Indians, and the fund for the removal is a trifling thing. We acquired from those Indians the use of an immense tract of country, and agreed to provide liberally for them in the treaty which was negotiated; but the Government said to them, "No; trust to the magnanimity of this Government; do not provide specifically for what you shall have from year to year; but the Government knows your wants and will provide for them liberally." That occurred eighteen months ago, and from that day to this those Indians have not received one cent. They believed the plausible tale you told them that you would provide for them liberally, and they relied upon it and adopted your amendments to the treaty; and yet for eighteen months you have not done a thing for them. In the midst of the extreme cold of last winter, when they were starving and freezing, I appealed to the Senate on their behalf, and at the last moment compromised upon an appropriation of $20,000 for them, but the House of Representatives would not agree to give them a cent. That is the way you manage Indian affairs, and now in this bill of yours you make some trifling appropriation for them—I do not know what it is—and instead of leaving it in charge of those who have knowledge of these Indians and their wants and their habits and their peculiarities you take it away from them and give it to a bishop of the church.

Mr. CONKLING. The best man there is for the purpose.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator says he is the best man. I have a very high respect for Bishop Whipple, but there are many good men in Minnesota, though it is a new State, and these little distinctions are very invidious. Why not give the expenditure of this fund to Bishop Grace, of the Catholic church, who is a large-minded man, a man of great experience, whose followers among the Indians probably are ten times as many as those of the other bishop. I should think this matter would not be entirely acceptable to Bishop Whipple himself. I should think he would not like to be put in this position of being selected among all the religionists of Minnesota to take charge of this fund. He is a good man, an excellent man; I feel great friendship for him; but I do not like to see these invidious discriminations made by the committee in regard to the religionists of that State or any other State.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to explain to the Senator my remark as to Bishop Whipple. I have only to say that he has given such unwearied attention to this subject, he has thought so much, he has written so much, he has done so much creditable to him that there is nothing invidious in saying that he, more than other prelates or clergymen, is a good man for this purpose.

Mr. HENDERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Minnesota, I will state in reference to that matter what I intended to state when I was up before the reason for this action of the committee. Two years ago we appropriated precisely the amount estimated by the agent, Mr. Thompson, for the removal of those Indians, and subsisting them for six months on their new reservation. He estimated the number of the Indians and the cost of the removal, and we appropriated the exact amount according to that estimate. I was then upon the committee, and caused the appropriation to be made. The agent who made that estimate now reports to us that he has removed only eleven hundred Indians, and that there are nearly two thousand yet to be removed; and that the entire amount which he estimated for and which we appropriated has been expended. That is the condition of the thing. There are nineteen hundred and sixty-six Indians to be removed, and the amount estimated for and appropriated has been entirely expended.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator is confounding the Chippewas with the Sioux.

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. RAMSEY. No estimate was made for the removal of the Sioux at Devil's Lake and Traverse Lake.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am speaking of the Indians of whom Mr. Thompson is the agent. He is the agent of these Indians, is he not? Mr. Bassett still retains control of his own Indians.

Mr. RAMSEY. The nineteen hundred the Senator speaks of were Chippewas. We have never made any appropriation at all for the removal of the Sioux.

Mr. HENDERSON. Of course not; but it is the Indians in the charge of Mr. Benjamin Thompson that we now propose to put under the management and control of Bishop Whipple. I am satisfied that what I have stated in reference to that matter is correct. Mr. Thompson made his own estimate for the cost and expense of the removal, and having failed to do the work according to his undertaking, it was supposed by the committee that Bishop Whipple would carry it out.

Mr. HOWE. I see the Senate is impatient for a vote and I shall delay a vote but a short time. I did not intend to say a word upon this report; but there have been several complaints alleged against it already, and to a certain extent they seem to be indorsed by a member of the committee, the honorable Senator from Missouri, and I must plead that as my excuse for saying a few things.

The pending motion is that of the Senator from California to print. I think he and the Senator from Oregon have shown the Senate conclusively that there is no necessity for printing the report; that they know all about it or all they care to know about it; and every other Senator who has participated in this discussion seems to be well informed as to the state of the report. Then there is no necessity for printing it.

The great complaint urged by the Senator from California is that there is not an equal distribution of funds between the two sections of the country, between that bordering on the Pacific and that on this side of the mountains. He has taken the pains to give us the figures showing how much is appropriated to the support of the Indians west of the mountains and how much to those on this side, and he finds out that the largest amount is appropriated to those on this side. That is so. He says these large appropriations are made on this side of the mountains upon the shallow pretext—that was his language—of complying with treaty stipulations. Now, Mr. President, I have misunderstood the character of the Senator from California very much if he means really to be understood as calling the compliance with a positive national stipulation a shallow pretext. I think it is something more than that, very much more than that. Why, sir, we have agreed to pay these specific sums of money, and so we pay them, not upon shallow pretext, but we so pay them to save the national honor; and I think it is as essential to the national peace to do what we have agreed to do this side of the mountains as it is to do what we never agreed to do the other side of the mountains.

Mr. COLE. The Senator will permit me to interrupt him for a moment. Is there any greater obligation existing to take care of the Indians that are treated with than of those who have been deprived of their property, their lands, their means of living, their hunting grounds and fishing grounds, with whom there are no treaties? Is the obligation greater in the one case than in the other? If so, I do not see it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator must remember two or three things so far as the public domain is concerned in the eastern portion of the country. We have always conceded that the right of occupation was in the Indians, and we have proceeded to get possession of it by negotiation and purchase, and what we have agreed to pay we have paid. The territory of which the Senator speaks is the territory we purchased in fee from another Power and paid that other Power for it, and having paid once for it we do not see the obligation very clearly of paying another party.

But the Senator says that these Indians had possessions, cultivations; they had vines, fields, and white populations have moved upon them and driven the Indians off, and now he calls upon the United States to pay the Indians, as I understand him, for what his own citizens have plundered from them.

Mr. COLE. No, sir; to take care of them, since the Government has suffered them to be so outraged.

Mr. HOWE. Take care of them since the citizens of his own State have plundered them and made them poor. That I understand to be his logic; we must take care of them and support them. That is a little difficult to do. The measure of their necessities we cannot always clearly understand. The Senator undoubtedly is correct in saying that those who live on that coast understand them better than we can. That is not unnatural. He complains a little that no Senator from the Pacific coast was on the committee. Well, it is true it so happened in making up the committee that there was no Senator from that region on the committee; but the Senator, I think, must be aware that while no member of the Senate from that coast was upon the committee there were three Senators from the Pacific coast before the committee, and we had an opportunity to be told all that they cared to tell us.

Mr. COLE. And the Senator is aware, too, that the committee utterly disregarded all the representations of the three Senators from the Pacific coast who had appeared before the committee.

Mr. HOWE. I think my honorable friend does the committee great injustice in saying that they "utterly disregarded"——

Mr. COLE. I do not intend to do injustice. I will say, then, that they generally disregarded all the suggestions those Senators made.

Mr. HOWE. We did not exactly conform—I guess the Senator had better let it rest upon that—we did not exactly conform to the advice given us by them on these subjects, though we had the utmost respect for it.

Mr. COLE. I will not change my phraseology.

Mr. HOWE. But there was no advantage taken if our judgments did not happen to conform with theirs. That may be the misfortune of the country, or it may not be any misfortune to the country. We cannot tell about that. The point I make is that there was no disposition to take advantage of that section of the country.

Mr. President, the large disbursements which are made on this side are occasioned by two considerations: first, we have the whole expense of the Indian service to provide for. The salaries of all the officers, East and West, come out of the appropriations which the Senator charges to the eastern service. Second, there is the compliance with our positive obligations, the redemption of our unqualified promises. We have done these two things. Beyond that, I think there are not $50,000 in this bill appropriated this side of the mountains; there are not $50,000 appropriated in this bill for the purpose of keeping the peace, as the Senator calls it, or for the purpose of merely administering to poverty or necessity. That is my impression, though I have not footed up the figures. Beyond the mountains the great bulk of the appropriations are made to those to whom we are under the obligation of no promise whatever. They are charitable dispensations in the main made there. I think that is doing pretty well; and I do not think there is any disposition on the part of either of the committees or of either of the two Houses to be niggardly in their appropriations. We know that the necessity is upon us; we have got to make provision in some way; and I have been painfully impressed with the fact that almost every man over there in the Indian service appeals to Congress with a tomahawk in his hand. The uniform argument is, "You must give us so much of money, or there is a fight." That is the appeal addressed to us from every quarter. Not "we have promised to pay it;" but "if you do not pay, you will have an Indian war."

Mr. CORBETT. Does the Senator pretend to say that with the Indians in Oregon there are no treaty stipulations, and that the same rule does not apply to the Indians in Washington and Idaho as applies to those on this side? The white people went there from this side, and acquired that country, and kept it from going into the hands of Great Britain. They have taken the same ground with the Indians there that the Senator speaks of, and have purchased the rights of the Indians as you have done on this side. So far as California is concerned it may be different; but I speak now particularly of Oregon and Washington and Idaho Territories.

Mr. HOWE. So far as we have treaties there, we meet their obligations just as we do on this side.

Mr. CORBETT. There are treaties with those Indians that I have named, and they were moved upon the reservations in conformity with the treaty. The Government, however, never ratified the treaty, and they have been living there since by virtue of an annual appropriation made for supporting them. Now you refuse to ratify the treaty, and you refuse to make the appropriation to sustain them and keep them on the reservation, and so you will turn them loose. There is one party here opposed to any treaties, and another party opposed to making appropriations unless in cases where there is a treaty, so that it cuts both ways.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator is a little mistaken as to the position of the Government. He says we made a treaty with some of these tribes and have refused to ratify it. We made a treaty, and we assigned to them a reservation and agreed to certain expenditures for them. If the Senate refused to ratify that treaty, I do not know the fact. My impression is that the Senate never was asked to ratify it. My impression is the people of Oregon themselves did not want it ratified; but I do not know how the fact is.

Mr. CORBETT. It was made in 1855. I do not know why it has not been ratified; but I understand from the reports that there have been appeals made by each superintendent to have it ratified or some steps taken in the premises.

Mr. HOWE. Does the Senator understand that the Senate has ever refused to ratify it?

Mr. CORBETT. I understand so; but I only have this information from the reports and the constant recommendations of the superintendents.

Mr. POMEROY. It has never been reported to the Senate from the committee.

Mr. CORBETT. It was a treaty made by General Palmer in 1855. I had a printed copy of it here yesterday.

Mr. HOWE. I have no doubt the Senator had a printed copy of the treaty, but that would not show that the Senate ever refused to ratify it unless it so stated on it. My understanding is that the Senate could not have refused to ratify it, because I do understand the Indians have received every advantage which that treaty stipulated to them, with the exception that one portion of the reservation which was set aside for their occupation was recently taken away from them by the people of Oregon. They entered into possession of it, and the President has authorized it to be sold, and in this bill we have made an appropriation to compensate the Indians for it. What objection we could have to ratifying the treaty I cannot conceive, inasmuch as we consented to let them have every advantage that the treaty gave them.

But, Mr. President, I do not suppose these Indians are particularly suffering. The difference between the Senator from Oregon and the committee was this: he asked, I believe, for $50,000.

Mr. CORBETT. Twenty-five thousand dollars of it only goes to Oregon.

Mr. HOWE. Fifty thousand dollars for Washington and Oregon; and we have appropriated $20,000.

Mr. CORBETT. For six thousand Indians.

Mr. HOWE. That appropriation may not be sufficient to secure peace; but inasmuch as we have promised no part of it, I should think that if the Indians were clever and were treated cleverly by the people there they would be rather thankful for getting $20,000 than mad because they did not get $50,000. If I were in their place I should be thankful for it.

Perhaps I have said more than need be said on this subject, but I did want to rescue the committee from the imputation of having designed any injustice to that portion of the country.

Mr. CORBETT. I wish to say that there was no desire on my part to reflect upon the committee, but I do feel that they do not understand the position of the Indian affairs of that country, the way it is situated, the manner in which the Indians are treated; and it does seem to me that by reducing the appropriations, by cutting down the salaries of the employés to a price at which they cannot be employed, by reducing the appropriations by which peace has been maintained with the Indians, we are taking a step to inaugurate another Indian war upon the Pacific coast.

When you make these reductions you disregard the treaty stipulations with the Indians with whom there are treaties, and there will be a portion of these employés who will be discharged. There will then, of course, be complaint from the Indians that the treaty stipulations have not been lived up to. There is a tribe here now that has come seven thousand miles to make these very complaints, from the fact that the appropriation for their agency was not large enough to support the proper number of employés, and the Department was compelled to combine two employés in one and take the money and apply it to one employé, where the Indians were entitled to two. The committee of conference have cut down the usual appropriations, and the result will be that the Department will have to reduce the force—to discharge a blacksmith or a farmer or a physician provided for by treaty, and the result will be dissatisfaction.

Then the amount that has annually been appropriated to those Indians with whom there are no treaty stipulations has been stricken out entirely with the exception of $10,000 for three thousand Indians in Oregon. What would that do I should like to know to support those Indians?

I simply make these suggestions. I can do nothing more than protest. I fear it may create a great deal of difficulty, and I wish to relieve myself of the responsibility. I suppose that it is not in order to amend this report of a conference committee; if it were, I should move to amend it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope we shall have a vote on this matter. All this talk is perfectly useless. If the Senators had a little more experience they would know that it is utterly useless on a bill of this kind to protest against the report being adopted. It is only spending time for nothing.

Mr. COLE. I shall detain the Senate but a very few minutes. The Senator from Wisconsin makes complaint that these demands for assistance to the Indian department in California are too importunate, and, to use his strange expression, they are made with tomahawk in hand. The Senator may not be aware of the fact that these Indians are deprived of all means of living except such as are furnished them by the whites, and unless there is some means of supporting them by the whites there must necessarily be disturbance there. The Indian agents on the reservations in California dare not put arms into the hands of the Indians to go and hunt as they formerly did, because the moment an Indian is found outside of the reservation with a gun he is shot down by the first white man who meets him, and disarmed. The difficulty we have to contend with is that they are not allowed to get their own living in the ordinary way, the way in which they were accustomed to get it in former times. They are not allowed to go up on the streams to catch fish, because if they go off the reservations they are treated in the same harsh manner. This is the reason why perhaps some strong expressions are made use of; and I might now reiterate that difficulties are constant and of daily occurrence in that country, and the whites are suffering by reason of the want of care of the Indians.

I would make a further suggestion before I take my seat, and that is that these economical ebullitions on the part of committees and Congressmen relate too often to small matters, whereas you do not see their application to the larger matters; and to illustrate the statement I make I will point to a particular case in California. We were renting a reservation at Smith river, in the northern portion of the State at a yearly rent, I believe, of about twenty-five hundred dollars in gold. The proposition was made to break up that reservation and remove the Indians to one of the established reservations at Hoopa valley or Round valley, and the smallest amount that could possibly suffice for effecting the removal of six hundred and twenty-five Indians a distance of several hundred miles is $5,000. That amount on the closest estimate was asked for, but the committee of conference cut it down to $3,500, and break up the reservation. How is it expected that these Indians can be removed for that small sum of $3,500 in greenbacks, a distance of several hundred miles, I cannot imagine. If they are taken to the Round valley reservation, where it is desirable they shall be taken, they will have to be embarked upon a steamer and taken to the nearest port on Round valley, and there disembarked. I tell the gentlemen that it cannot be done for that sum, and the present Indian reservation by their bill is broken up, and so some of these Indians must be set afloat again; and if the history of the past in regard to the Indians of that portion of the State were well known it would be appreciated that nothing but difficulty can be expected. These are the Klamath Indians who have heretofore been very hostile, and that have cost you already a large sum in the way of an Indian war.

No, sir; as an offset to this I see every little while something presented to us in the form of a congressional document showing that large sums are due by virtue of treaties running up to millions. Millions are claimed to be due to the shadows of tribes by virtue of treaties, as if the obligations made in the form of innumerable treaties with every little fragment of a tribe of savages was of more consequence than the support of these Indians with whom there have been no treaties. We have not a single treaty with any one of the one hundred or more tribes in California, because we do not regard that as the proper and economical way of getting along with the Indians. We do not ask for any treaties; but we do ask that they shall be so far cared for as to keep them peaceable and quiet.

On the other side of the mountains the Indian service costs only two or three hundred thousand dollars a year. I assert that the whole Indian service, except the department here at Washington, on this side of the mountains should not cost more than that, that instead of the two or three millions, we spend, two or three hundred thousand dollars would suffice on this as well as on the other side of the mountains; and there is no reason for expending these large sums except under the pretext—I still adhere to that language—of treaties with shadows of tribes of savages, none of whom are even able to read a treaty. Their names are signed to the treaty with a cross; they know nothing about them. They are in most instances a mere pretext for robbing the Treasury of the United States. There is great injustice practiced toward these Indians with whom there are no treaties, and who are constantly making disturbance with the white race; I complain that proper provision is not made in that regard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARLAN in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from California, that the report of the conference committee, with the bill as amended, be printed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1444) changing the ports of entry from Plymouth to Edenton, in North Carolina, and Port Royal to Beaufort, in South Carolina, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Martha Ann Wallace;

A bill (H. R. No. 1837) granting an increase of pension to Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 243) to admit free of duty certain statuary; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 354) admitting steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1868.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILLEY. I move that leave of absence for the residue of the session be granted to the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. POOL.] He is compelled to leave the city.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1444) changing the ports of entry from Plymouth to Edenton, in North Carolina, and Port Royal to Beaufort, in South Carolina, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will give way long enough to enable me to make a report.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will only make further debate.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. CONNESS. I am aware of that, but upon this motion I call for the yeas and nays; and I wish to be permitted to suggest to the Senate that if they will give me fifteen minutes I think we can pass the bill which I have in charge and get rid of it, and I am exceedingly anxious that that shall be done. I hope it will be done. I do not think anybody will debate the bill further. We can act on the amendments and pass it, and let it go to the other House in such shape as may be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I stated this morning the reason why I thought we ought to proceed to the consideration of executive business, and gave notice that I should make the motion at two o'clock. The debate on the conference report upon the Indian appropriation bill has prevented it. The honorable Senator's bill was in order at one o'clock, but he chose to give way to pension bills.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator knows I could not help it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator gave way, and those pension bills took up half an hour. Under these circumstances I do not think we ought now to launch again into the debate on the Senator's bill.

Mr. CONNESS. We do not propose to debate it. Just let us vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That cannot be done, because I know gentlemen will speak on it.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire before the question is taken on this motion to submit a proposition relative to adjournment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not now. After we go into executive session the doors can be opened for that purpose if the Senate choose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conkling, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frilinghuyson, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Norton, Rice, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Whyte, and Wiley—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Connors, Corbett, Drake, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Nye, Osborn, Pomeroy, Pool, Ross, Stewart, Tipton, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Oranin, Dixon, Grimes, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Thayer, and Welch—13.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After a few minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the resolution of the House fixing a day for the final adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution received from the House of Representatives on the 30th of June last:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring.) That the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses without day on Wednesday, the 15th of July next, at noon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state the reason why I have called up this resolution and desire to have action upon it. A rule of the House of Representatives authorizes a motion to suspend the rules for ten days before an adjournment, but as no time has been fixed for an adjournment, as is usually done long before the adjournment, they are embarrassed in getting at the kind of business that they want to dispose of, and therefore it is absolutely necessary that the time should be fixed or be within their power. Therefore, as I think we can dispose of all the business necessary by Thursday, I move to amend the resolution by striking out "Wednesday, the 15th of July," and inserting "Thursday, the 23d of July."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator had better fix Friday.

Mr. CONNESS. I think we had better name Monday.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is for Senators to say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We are so much embarrassed with treaties and other things in executive session that it will be almost impossible to get through by Thursday. However, it may be done. I think we may accomplish it by Friday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest care about it. If Friday is the general sentiment of the Senate I am willing to accept that.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us compromise on Friday.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I modify my motion and say "Friday, the 24th of July."

Mr. CONNESS. Unless the Senate wish to be summoned to meet again in executive session I think they had better not fix Friday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We may be summoned and not come.

Mr. CONNESS. If the President issues his proclamation convening us, every Senator who obeys his oath and his duty will be here. There is business enough to last until Monday. I would say Saturday rather than Friday; but Monday would be a better day on which to adjourn. The President has an opportunity to examine bills; we shall not be so crowded; the work will be better done. There is a great deal of business remaining undone still, and there is a good deal of executive business. We have passed over a great many names. The President will continue to send them in. To my knowledge there are a great many vacant places in the State I represent, for which no nominations have been made. In the case of vacant post offices the Postmaster General will exercise his power under the law of appointing special agents to take charge of them, and we shall be in a bad condition. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from Ohio by substituting Monday next, the 27th day of July. I think if we can finish up our business at that time we shall do well. If we attempt to adjourn before that time I think it is exceedingly doubtful whether we shall not get a very much longer session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe that every appropriation bill is now out of the way. I am so informed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The deficiency bill is now in conference, and will be agreed upon in a short time. I do not know that there is a single measure of general importance that has not been acted upon. We can dispose of the executive business, in my judgment, in four hours.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is one very important measure pending, I think, and that is the Alaska appropriation. I should feel very much mortified if that should be lost.

Mr. RAMSEY. I wish to say on this subject of adjournment, that every Senator knows that within the last ten days or two weeks of the session the Committee on Finance come in from day to day and monopolize all the hours of the day and drive out every other kind of business, and then as soon as they get through with their measures they tell us all the business is disposed of, and we are ready to adjourn at once.

Mr. POMEROY. There is no doubt that we have the power to adjourn to-morrow; but if we expect to complete the public business, we shall not be able to adjourn.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the "public business?" allow me to ask.

Mr. POMEROY. One of the most important things, in my mind, is to be sure that we make a law out of the bill that passed the Senate last night. There is not a more important measure to secure the restoration of the States and to preserve peace and order in the South than that measure. You may run off and leave it in the hands of the Executive if you choose.

Mr. CONKLING. The apprehension of the Senator seems to be that the President may veto that bill, or that he may not return it in time. Is that it?

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator can draw his own conclusions. We have always found that it took ten days on any measure of that character.

Mr. CONKLING. I only inquire if that is it. If that is it it is answered entirely, to my mind, by this consideration: if we fix an hour of adjournment and there is an important bill that has not come back, all we need to do is that which has been done so repeatedly, even during my brief experience here, to extend for a short time the session, or if need be rescind the resolution. There is no difficulty about that in the world.

Mr. POMEROY. The next point I desire to make is this: after passing that measure, which I consider of the greatest importance of any we now have pending, the newspapers have spoken of a treaty with China. I should like to know if Senators intend to adjourn without confirming that?

Mr. SHERMAN. We can confirm that in five minutes.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; you cannot.

Mr. POMEROY. You cannot confirm it in three days, and begin it to-day, if Senators make the speeches they design to make upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no necessity of confirming it.

Mr. POMEROY. Yesterday was spent on a treaty that everybody understands, and everybody knows what the executive session is for to-day. You may conclude the legislative business in ten days, but if you adjourn before that we shall be certain to have an executive session.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think it is important to finish the business. Whether we do finish it or not will depend upon the wishes and inclinations of gentlemen of the Senate. If it is the determination of anybody, after we have fixed a day, to talk against time for the sake of defeating anything, of course we shall not get through the business. I cannot presume that that is the intention. We have got two treaties. They need not necessarily take up much time. We have got some Indian treaties beside, I suppose, which will not take up a great deal of time.

Mr. STEWART. They can go over.

Mr. HENDERSON. No; they cannot.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Some, perhaps, may be put by, and some not. Then we have the nominations, which necessarily take very little time. Therefore, if we are disposed to do the business, we can do it in a very short period. There is nothing left that is absolutely requisite. Senators need not say much about the appropriation bills, because those bills are necessary in order that the Government should go on. By common consent they are considered as the bills which take precedence. They have been disposed of substantially. Everything of that sort, except the little bill which was passed this morning is substantially out of the way, and that will require very little time.

It is quite manifest that we never can close this session until we fix a day for closing it. When we do we work with reference to the time that is left us and what we have to do, and the Senate is generally disposed to take up that which is indispensable first, and then, if there is any time left, to devote it to what they deem the next most important business. Now, I take it that what are indispensable are the appropriation bills, which are pretty much disposed of, and the executive business, which we want to dispose of for our own convenience. It may be that we shall not get through the whole of it. That will depend entirely upon Senators, and whether the President is disposed to let us go through; but the business that is on the Calendar of an executive character I suppose could be disposed of in a couple of hours if we set ourselves to work to do it. But if Senators are determined to push matters of rather a private character to the exclusion of that kind of business of course we cannot get through; and that will be the question for the Senate to decide.

Mr. CONNESS. What does the Senator mean by "matters of a private character?"

Mr. FESSENDEN. Substantially of a private character—pension bills, for instance, such as we had up to-day.

Mr. CONNESS. They are public.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, everything is public in our sense.

Mr. ANTHONY. Railroad grants?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, railroad grants and things of that sort. They are all public in one sense and private in another sense. I mean that they are not precisely that kind of business which it is indispensable to the welfare of the Republic between the time that can elapse between now and the next session of Congress shall be passed at this session; that is all. If Senators desire that everything that any one Senator feels an interest in shall be disposed of at this session instead of going over to the next, when it will be in order, all we have got to do is to sit straight along and not adjourn at all. That is the result inevitably; but that has never been considered the mode in which business was accomplished here, and we have necessarily to leave at the end of the long session a great deal of business to go over to the short session. And when we came to a point like this, having sat now until the 21st day of July, and being obliged to remain here a few days longer, and to meet again in so short a period, I think the majority of the Senate will be disposed to take up that business which is indispensable, do it, and adjourn, and to fix a day with reference to that; and that day may be fixed. If it become necessary, as my friend from New York said, for any particular reason to go over for a day or two longer, so be it. I have no objection to inserting Monday, as the honorable Senator from California suggests, but I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say, if the honorable Senator will permit me, that there is not any Senator here who is more anxious to get away than I am; but when the Senator speaks of private legislation I do not know that he means to class the bill I have been urging upon the attention of the Senate as private legislation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What bill does the Senator refer to?

Mr. CONNESS. The bill for the protection of American citizens abroad.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I do not think that is a private bill.

Mr. CONNESS. It is known that that bill is yet unacted upon and it must go back to the other House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is an important bill of a public character; but I do not think the world will fall if it is not passed.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree with the Senator; nor would it fall if he and I were dead and buried.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think it would.

Mr. CONNESS. But still we had both better live our time out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In order to live our time out, we had better be thinking of the day of adjournment. [Laughter.] It is with reference to that very thing that we should fix it, and fix it at some reasonable time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think now it is rendered entirely probable that we can dispose of our public business and adjourn on Friday. I think there is an advantage in fixing Friday, even if it were probable that we should not adjourn until Monday, because if the day is fixed on Friday we shall all work up to that time; and that will be particularly the case with the President. Some bills may go to the President about which he may want some time for consideration, but if Congress indicate a desire to get away on Friday, he will work to that end; so that both branches working to that end, and the President having notice that we desire to get away on Friday, it may facilitate the dispatch of some public business.

Therefore I hope we shall agree upon that day, even though it were probable that we should be obliged on Friday to extend it to Monday, and there will be no inconvenience in doing it.

Mr. DRAKE. I do not see, for one, how the Senate can consent to fix any time for adjournment until the bill has become a law of which the Senator from Kansas spoke. In my opinion, if we leave that bill unacted on, fail to see that it is a law, it is just a question of giving up the loyal men of the South to rebel domination in the coming election and thereafter. I do not wish to stay here any more than any one else does, but I wish to stay here until we establish the work we have done or put it in the way of being established. I cannot consent, for one, to fix any day of adjournment until we know what is to become of the bill that we passed last night.

Mr. HOWARD. I concur entirely with the Senator from Missouri. I look upon the bill to which he has referred as one of the utmost importance, and I think that the peace of the country, especially of the southern States depends in a very great degree upon that bill becoming a law, and I think Congress ought not by an adjournment to enable Mr. Johnson to put that bill in his pocket, and thus suppress it forever. I look upon it as perhaps, in a certain sense, the most important bill that we have passed this session; and for one I cannot consent to the adjournment of Congress until it is certain that that bill has become a law. I have no doubt that Mr. Johnson will veto that bill for various reasons. Judging from the veto which he sent us yesterday, it is morally certain that he will veto it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He will send it right back.

Mr. DRAKE. How do you know?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Because his friends say he will.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no sort of confidence in the assurances as to the conduct of Mr. Johnson that we derive from his so-called friends. He will take the full ten days to consider that bill as is his constitutional right. He will exhaust the whole of the time. Suppose that bill is passed by the House of Representatives to-day and delivered to him to-day, which possibly may be the case; I do not know; he would have all the rest of this week, and he would have every week day during the next week, including a week from next Saturday to consider it, and he would not be obliged to send it into Congress until the following Monday, which would be the 3d of August. I think it would be running great hazard to leave the peace of the country in so precarious a condition as we should if we should go away leaving that bill in its present condition.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I shall vote for the earliest day of adjournment, and one desire that I have would be, if possible, to defeat the bill passed yesterday referred to by the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Michigan; and I think it is the duty of the President, if possible, to defeat it by any constitutional means within his power. I think that bill can promote no good to this country. I think pending a presidential election of so exciting a character as we are likely to have, it is an element of great danger to the peace and quiet of the country. It is known very well that there is a desire for the reduction of the Army. No Senator desires it more earnestly than myself. When there is a public measure of such importance as the reduction of the Army, the reduction, if possible, somewhat of the enormous expenses of the military institutions of the country, it is not right in my judgment to tack upon it a proposition so dangerous to the public peace.

I know that there is no occasion for the distribution of arms in the State of Indiana; my colleague must know that; and I believe that I know that there is no occasion for the distribution of arms in any State of the North. We are in a state of peace and quiet and harmony there so far as I know, except to the extent that the passions of the people are excited by the pending presidential contest, and those passions ought not to be increased by placing in the hands of any party of the people the public arms.

In the South, so far as it has been possible to do so, the legislation of this country has arrayed politically the white man against the black man. Now, by this measure it is proposed—I will not say it is the purpose, but it is a sure consequence of the measure—to array with military force and military power the black race against the white race. I have heard these statements about the murdering of freedmen in the southern States until they have become disgusting to me. I have information which justifies my judgment in disregarding all such rumors and reports. I do not believe a word of them. That there are disturbances in that section of the country, as there are in the North, I have no doubt. We have murderers in the North. We have public disturbances sometimes in the North. So they will occur in the South. They are always likely to occur in a country where public affairs are under the control of the people, and public passion is likely to be excited by the controversies for the control of the public judgment.

Now, sir, you propose to place in these States of the South this large amount of public arms; for what purpose? You say for the purpose of defense at the election. I say for the purpose—I will not use the word "purpose"—but to result in placing the election in these States as far as possible under the control of a military power; that we are to abandon the American idea that the intelligence of the people is to control the popular elections, and we are to resort to the worst examples that history furnishes us of controlling a popular election by military power. In neither North or South is this right.

Your presidential candidate closes his letter of acceptance by saying "let us have peace," and every heart in the land says "let us have peace;" but does any Senator believe that peace is promoted by arming one political party against the other party in a state of public sentiment such as we have at this time? In your bill you have provided that these arms are to fall into the hands of only one class of men, a class whom you denominate as "loyal;" and that simply means this much and no more: the men who support your partisan cause. The term "loyalty" in the southern States no longer means that class of white people or colored people, if you please, who, during the struggle and the controversy of arms for five years stood by the cause of the Union. It does not mean that class of men—

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDRICKS. It would be much more agreeable if I were allowed to finish the statement of an idea before the question is asked.

By your legislation you have relieved from disability within the last month, by the hundreds men who participated in the rebellion, men who agitated it; some who left the Halls of Congress to go into secession, and others who in State convention and in State Legislature demanded to take their States out. You have clothed with loyalty by act of Congress men who rallied the southern young men under the banner of the confederate government, men who by speech and every power that they could command called out the young men of the South to fight in the cause against the Government. You have clothed with loyalty men who went with bloody hands through this war. It is no longer a definition of "loyalty" in the southern States, according to partisan language, that men even refrained from aiding the cause of the rebellion. You have added to the list those whom Congress has seen fit to pardon. They now become a portion of the "loyalty" of the southern States, and they, the men who used arms to shoot northern soldiers for four years, are to be armed by an act of Congress that they may control the popular election next fall.

So far as the party to which I belong is concerned, all that we ask, North and South, is that this great question shall be settled by the people, the men of every section coming to the polls according to law and being governed by their judgments; but do you suppose that permanently you can establish a political power in this country by arming one party against another? Does any man desire it? I say to you that this is a dangerous question.

When the Senator from Michigan, in debate, says, "if the Democracy want more war, let them have it," what sentiment expressed by any Democrat justifies the Senator in that remark? The Senator invites war, not by word, not by letter, but by arming a political party at the cost of the Government; by placing in the hands of those whom you denominate "loyal" the power by force to suppress the judgment of those who differ with them, and it may be to carry it to the most dangerous extremes at this time. For one, I want no war. For one, I honestly want peace, North, South, East, and West. I believe that in the American people there is sufficient intelligence and patriotism to enable us to work off according to the spirit of our institutions this question that is in dispute between us; that we need no strife; that we need no further bloodshed; that there ought to be no arms brought to the precincts where men cast the ballot; that military forces ought to be kept away and men allowed to come up and cast their ballots according to their judgments and their consciences.

As a matter of pretense and policy and excuse this bill proposes to distribute arms among the northern States. We do not need them. They are not wanted. They are not asked, so far as I have been informed, by a single Governor of a northern State. No Legislature of a northern State, so far as I have observed, have asked this thing at your hands. Then why do you thrust guns into the hands of the people of the North? What for? Who is to be killed? What bloody strife is to be carried on just now pending a presidential election, for which you must arm a portion of the people? In the State of Indiana you want to place arms in the hands of those whom the Governor may denominate "loyal." The Governor to-day is a candidate for reelection; and it may be so in other States, and he is to decide among the people of that State who shall be armed with these terrible weapons of death.

These arms are to be "serviceable Springfield rifled muskets of caliber fifty-eight, with accouterments and equipments complete," all ready for the work of death, and they are to be distributed according to this bill, as follows:

Maine, seven thousand; New Hampshire, five thousand; Vermont, five thousand; Massachusetts, twelve thousand.

What does Massachusetts want with the arming of twelve regiments of men?

Rhode Island, four thousand; Connecticut, six thousand; New York, thirty-three thousand; New Jersey, seven thousand; Pennsylvania, twenty-six thousand; Delaware, three thousand; Maryland, seven thousand; West Virginia, five thousand; Ohio, twenty-one thousand; Indiana, thirteen thousand; Illinois, fifteen thousand; Michigan, eight thousand; Wisconsin, eight thousand; Iowa, eight thousand; Minnesota, four thousand; Missouri, eleven thousand; Kansas, three thousand; Nebraska, three thousand; Nevada, three thousand; California, five thousand; Oregon, three thousand; Kentucky, eleven thousand; Tennessee, eight thousand.

I am astonished that any Senator should ask to send into the State of Tennessee an additional supply of arms when you are so well-informed of the transactions at the last election in that State. Now, we come to the southern States:

North Carolina, nine thousand; South Carolina, six thousand; Georgia, ten thousand; Florida, three thousand; Alabama, eight thousand; Arkansas, five thousand; and Louisiana, seven thousand; and the same shall be delivered only upon the certificate of the Governor of such State, showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that the regiments and companies for which the same are required are duly organized of loyal citizens of such State.

So that when you send to Indiana your thirteen thousand Springfield rifled muskets, caliber fifty-eight, with all the accouterments necessary for men to go into the terrible struggle and strike for death, you say to the Governor of Indiana, himself being a candidate, that he may distribute those thirteen thousand arms according to his pleasure among the people of that State; and you expect the people to say that that is just; that that is patriotic and right! They will understand it.

Mr. WILSON. There is no such provision in the bill, and the Senator, if he will read the bill, will see that no such thing as that can be done. The Senator ought to know better than to make such a statement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I see what this bill says. I see that you say the Secretary of War shall send into the State of Indiana thirteen thousand Springfield rifled muskets, caliber fifty-eight, all ready for bloodshed, and you say in this—

Mr. WILSON. There is no such statement.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let me finish my sentence. And you say in this bill, "You shall distribute those arms only to loyal men," giving him the judgment of that matter.

Mr. WILSON. The bill states no such thing, and the Senator knows it. The bill states that those arms shall be given for the use of the militia organized into companies and regiments; not to men, not to the people, but to the organized militia of the States.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I express the sentiment of this bill accurately.

Mr. WILSON. You do not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do. That they are to be given to the organized militia does not change it. He is to be the judge whether the company of one hundred men who are to have one hundred rifled muskets, to shoot somebody with, are "loyal" men or not. You place in his hands the judgment of that question.

Mr. HOWARD. Who makes him the judge?

Mr. HENDRICKS. This bill makes him the judge.

Mr. HOWARD. No; by no manner of means does it make the Governor the judge. The laws provide for organizing the militia of Indiana, as of every other State, and the arms are to be placed in the hands of those who are organized into the militia by the laws of the State.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; I understand that very well. I understand very well this thing. Companies are organized and regiments are organized according to State laws, but men form themselves into those companies and into those regiments according to their pleasure, and when a company is satisfactory to the Governor of the State he certifies to the Secretary of War that these one hundred men are "loyal" according to his judgment, and then the Secretary of War may distribute the arms, and not till then. If that is not the language of the bill I cannot read anything. I will read it entire:

And the same shall be delivered only upon the certificate of the Governor of such State, showing to the satisfaction of the Secretary of War that the regiments and companies for which the same are required are duly organized of loyal citizens of such State under the laws thereof; and said muskets, accouterments, and equipments shall remain the property of the United States, subject to the control of Congress.

That is the whole of it. To these States are to be distributed these arms just preceding a presidential election when Senators know there ought to be no arms distributed among the people, when every admonition of the past is that we ought to avoid a military power in the presence of a popular election, when it is the true interest of this country to promote peace and harmony and to avoid the possibility of strife and bloodshed. Give us this contest according to the sentiments of the fathers; let the people come to the ballot-box and let them cast their ballots according to their judgments, and whoever is elected, whether it be General Grant or Governor Seymour, it will be satisfactory; but when it is carried by military power, and that military power organized at the expense of all the people, I say to Senators it will not be satisfactory.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the Senator, if he will permit me, what he and his friends, or the parties on the other side, are going to do about it if it is not satisfactory?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator asks that in any spirit of bravado I do not choose to answer it.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator does not, as toward the Senator from Indiana, at all. He respects that Senator too much to do that; but he does it in the spirit of courage and patriotism against any party that dare rise against public authority.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am against any party that undertakes to control the elections in this country by military power. I am content with an election where the people in the exercise of their rights under the Constitution of the United States and of their States shall come up and elect anybody that they please, whoever he may be. I say that the voice of the people, as expressed at the ballot-box, when they have an opportunity to express their judgment freely and fairly, must stand; but does the Senator from California ask that there shall be such elections in this country as were once held in France, where the understanding was, "It is all right that you shall vote, but you must vote for Napoleon." Is that the sentiment that is to be inaugurated?

Mr. CONNESS. No, Mr. President. I reply to the Senator that I do not accept his statement of the case. The Senator is perverting the case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I say that this bill is so framed as to put arms in the hands of a particular class of persons in the southern States, and you say that there is excitement and hostility there already. Then you propose to put arms in the hands of an excited people and to arm one class of them against another. Sir, I hope it may be in the power of the President, under the Constitution, to defeat this bill. I cared but little for your bill that was intended to say that Virginia and Mississippi and Texas should not vote. I listened to the veto message of that bill with very little interest; but when it comes to this measure that involves the fortunes of war or peace, I should be guilty if I did not raise my voice in the Senate against the great wrong. Sir, there are three States of this Union omitted here, and only three, the States of Virginia, of Mississippi, and of Texas. Tell the country why you omitted these three States. Why do you omit Virginia and Mississippi and Texas? Because there is to be no election for President there.

Mr. WILSON. Because your Army of the United States, by the terms of the law, are to stay there and preserve the public peace, while they may be removed from these reconstructed States, where there will be no force to punish any outrage that may be perpetrated against the law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no law requiring the removal of the Army from these States.

Mr. WILSON. I thought the Senator had been demanding it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I shall be happy to see the day when there shall not be an armed soldier anywhere in this country to keep the people down. I believe all you have to do is to allow the people North and South to exercise their patriotic sentiment in support of this country and all will be right. I am more afraid, though, of a militia force, with arms supplied thus, than I am of the regular Army. I would rather risk the regular troops of the country, under the command of General Grant, to control the elections in these States, than this militia, which is to be made up of partisans. There is no proposition, in my judgment, so dangerous as this; and when you tell the people that you adopt the language of General Grant, and say "Let us have peace," and then pass a bill more likely to disturb the peace and bring on broil and strife and bloodshed than any that possibly can be conceived they will not believe you in the first statement that you are for peace.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I desire to ask the Senator a question. He knows very well that when the rebel army was disbanded it took home with it its arms. He knows, therefore, that those who were in the rebel army have arms in their hands at the South, while many of the loyal men of the South have no arms. This gives an advantage to the disloyal over the loyal in the coming election. Suppose that arms now are distributed to the organized militia of the South, will it not place them simply in a condition of armed neutrality? His principal objection is that these arms are to be distributed to the loyal. Would he have them distributed to the disloyal?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would not have them distributed to anybody. I would have this election go on under the benign spirit of peace, and have the people at the ballot-box decide the question who shall be President of the United States, and I do not propose to go into the inquiry how, as between political parties, you shall balance the possession of arms. The Senator from New Hampshire knows that the arms that he speaks of are not in the hands of the people. They were surrendered and placed in arsenals, and are not in the hands of the people.

Mr. DRAKE. Do I understand the honorable Senator to say that the rebel arms were surrendered?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DRAKE. I think the honorable Senator is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. According to the terms of the surrender they were placed in the arsenals, and not retained by the troops.

Mr. DRAKE. So many of them as they succeeded in holding at the time of the surrender; but the great mass of their armies had then dispersed and gone to their homes with their arms in their hands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the great body of the arms that had been in the hands of the southern soldiers were not in existence at the time of the surrender, in my judgment. At recent elections there has been no use of arms in the southern States; there has been no parade of arms; there has been no trouble; there has been no backing down of one party by the military power of the other. There is nothing in the past which justifies the assumption that you must balance the martial power of the respective parties. Then, sir, this is simply a naked proposition, in view of a coming election, a great and a very important election, that you shall arm one political party against another; and I say that it is instructive that the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas are omitted from the bill. It is not for self-protection; it is to arm men where an election is to take place, and nowhere else.

Mr. President, I conclude what I have to say by expressing the hope that the adjournment may come and that the President will exercise all the power that he possesses to defeat this most dangerous measure to the peace and quiet of the country.

Mr. WILSON and Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Chair.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say a few words.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was about to propose that we go back into executive session.

Mr. WILSON. No; I desire this debate to go on.

Mr. DRAKE. Let us have this out.

Mr. WILSON. This debate has come up suddenly, and now I desire the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana seems to have lost his temper, and with it to have lost his powers of discrimination, and his fairness, too. He seizes the occasion of a motion to fix the day of adjournment to make a labored misconstruction of the bill passed by the Senate yesterday. If the Senator had been here last evening he probably would have taken part in the debate upon the passage of the bill then. Being absent then, he comes here now and holds up that measure before the country as a measure for arming a portion of the people against another portion of the people, as arming one political party against another political party to affect the elections this autumn. Sir, that bill has nothing whatever to do with the elections in any State this autumn. No Senator who voted for that bill supposed that one of these muskets will be on the shoulder of a single man on the days of the elections this autumn. I do not know of anybody who thought of it. I say here before God that when I made that proposition I never dreamed that one of these muskets would be at the elections this autumn, or that the proposition had anything to do with the elections. I was surprised, I confess, when the allusion was first made to the elections by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If these arms are not to be in the control of partisans before the election, why was the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. VICKERS] decisively voted down when he proposed that the distribution should not take place until after the election?

Mr. WILSON. I will tell the Senator why it is proposed to put these arms into the hands of the Governors of the States for the better arming of the militia. We propose to reduce our Army from fifty-three thousand to thirty thousand men. There are stationed in the rebel States nineteen thousand men, including about five thousand on the frontiers in Texas. There are only fourteen thousand men stationed in nine of the States lately in rebellion. We propose to reduce the whole Army more than twenty thousand men. We expect as the States are reconstructed that most of the military forces will be withdrawn from them, with the exception of the number necessary to hold the forts and fortifications and military points in those States. In fact, as the Senator from New York suggests to me, the reconstruction laws require the withdrawal of the troops when the States are reconstructed. These States have just been organized. Their Legislatures are in session. It is expected that they will provide for the organization of some militia forces for the purpose of maintaining the authority of the laws of those States. They have a right so to do, and it is their duty to do so in order to maintain the authority of the Government and the public peace.

Now, what is the proposition which the Senator has assailed so fiercely? It is in perfect harmony with all our history from the beginning of the Government to the present time. We have for two generations made annual distributions of arms among the States to arm the militia. These new State governments in the South propose to organize militia forces as these forces exist in the loyal States, to maintain order, law, and peace. Our proposition is simply to give the Secretary of War authority, on the requisition of the Governor of a State who can show that he has organized regiments and companies, to furnish as many thousands of arms as the State has electors for President. The Governor puts the arms into the hands of the militia of the State organized according to law. That is the proposition and all there is about it. The laws may be violated, set at defiance by lawless men too strong to be put down by the civil authority. Yes, sir, before their militia is organized there may be violations of law which will require armed forces to aid in suppressing. If they organize a militia, and that militia is well armed, the fact that such a force is embodied in the State will tend to preserve the public peace. If the new State governments are weak, that weakness invites disorder; if those governments are strong, that strength assures order. I say upon my conscience that this proposition to aid in arming the militia of the reconstructed States was made in the interests of social order, of public law and peace.

That was the object of the bill. It has no reference whatever to arming one portion of the people against another, and no reference to the elections. It is not at all likely that on the day of the election, when the people of all parties will go to the polls, one single musket will be shouldered or any attempt made to use one unless there should be a violation of the law by powerful combinations too strong to be put down by the sheriff or constables or the civil authorities. Should there be such violence a militia force would then be called out according to law upon the order of the civil authority, simply as a posse to aid in the enforcement of the laws. That is all there is in this measure, and out of this simple measure for the security of law and order and the protection of the whole people we had last night and we have again to-day passionate denunciations of it.

Sir, the Senator from Indiana talks glibly about what the people want to know, what the people will do, and what the people will not do. Surely the Senator from Indiana should have been instructed by the events of the last seven years to be a little modest in his claims to speak for the American people. The people of the United States have not commissioned the Senator from Indiana nor those with whom he is accustomed to act to utter their sentiments or opinions, nor to announce what they will do or will not do. Claiming to speak in the name of the American people, the assembled Democracy in 1864 pronounced the war for the unity of the Republic a failure. The American people sternly rebuked that presumption. Assuming once again to speak in the name of the American people the Democratic chiefs of every hue in convention assembled pronounced the reconstruction acts that have restored seven rebel States to their practical relations as "usurpation," and as "unconstitutional," "revolutionary," and "void." It may be that the people will again sternly rebuke the leaders of the Democracy for presuming to speak the sentiments of loyal America. The lessons of the last eight years should teach the Senator from Indiana and his political associates greater caution in their assumptions to speak in the name and on behalf of the people.

A stranger listening to the Senator from Indiana could not fail to understand that the Senator was deeply impressed with the conviction that the majority in these Chambers were filled with anxiety concerning the results of the coming presidential election. I assure the Senator from Indiana, and those who act with him here or elsewhere, that I have not during the last twelve months entertained a doubt of the result of the approaching election for Chief Magistrate of the Republic. I took occasion to say in November last, when the political associates of the Senator from Indiana were jubilant over temporary victories, that nearly thirty States would vote for General Grant for President of the United States, and that the Forty-First Congress would have nearly one hundred majority in the House of Representatives to support his administration. I have more than once repeated the prediction then made. I can assure the Senator from Indiana that nothing transpired in the New York convention to shake my faith in this opinion so often expressed.

The Senator from Indiana affects to fear that the people will be overawed by armed forces at the ballot-boxes. He demands the right to vote unawed by armed men. The Senator desires fair play at the polls; so do we. The Senator's friends will have fair play at the polls, and he knows that they will have fair play. Our friends will not have fair play at the polls, and tens of thousands of his friends mean that they shall not have fair play at the polls. Tens and tens of thousands of poor men, houseless and homeless, will go to the election in which they and their race have interests of such transcendent magnitude, under menaces of being driven, they and their wives and children, from their humble cabins, of being dismissed from employment and from the fields they are cultivating on shares. Tens of thousands of these poor laboring men will go to the polls to vote for the security of their own liberties and the enlargement of their own rights and privileges at the peril of personal insults and assaults endangering life itself. Upon the heads of these poor toiling men, emancipated and enfranchised by their country, will be rained down as they approach the ballot-boxes the fiercest storms of scorn, hatred, and wrath. The men who represented the southern States in the convention at New York, assured their political associates that they would carry the reconstructed States. They knew, their political friends knew, that the rebel Democracy can only carry the southern States for their greenback and grayback ticket by menace, intimidation, and violence at the polls. It is the purpose of the boldest of the rebel leaders, and in this they are sustained by many of their northern associates to seize the polls in the South and have the white vote alone cast. At the ratification meeting in New York Wade Hamilton called on his Democratic associates to register an oath that they would place Seymour and Blair in the White House in spite of all the bayonets that could be brought against them, if they received a majority of the white votes, and thousands of northern men who have not forgotten their old servility to their southern chiefs, respond with alacrity to this appeal of the Carolina rebel.

The Senator from Indiana knows too well that it is the purpose of the Democratic party if it shall win power, to undo what Congress has done, to overturn the measures of reconstruction, to strike down the power of the loyal and to put the governments of those States into the keeping of the disloyal. The President refuses to recognize the validity of the reconstruction acts or to sustain the newly reconstructed State governments. The Democracy in national convention assembled pronounced those acts unconstitutional and void. Blair is pledged to execute the will of the people by trampling into dust the usurpations of Congress known as the reconstruction acts. Ex-confederate Governor Vance, of North Carolina, announces at Richmond, that what the confederacy fought for would be won by the election of Seymour and Blair. Wise proclaims that secession is more alive than ever, that he supports the nominees because they would assume military power for the overthrow of the reconstructed governments at the South. The pirate Semmes proclaims at Mobile that he has been a Democrat all his life, before the war, during the war, and since the war, and fought the war on the principles of Democracy; that the issue will again reduce the negro to a subordinate position as the inferior race. Percy Walker, once one of the Representatives of the people, who denounces Grant as a human donkey, and Colfax as a man possessed only of low and persistent cunning, declares that the great national Democratic party has taken up our cause, that Horatio Seymour says the negro cannot rule this country, that Blair says that the white man's government should be restored by the bayonet. Toombs and Cobb and unrepentant rebeldom leap to the support of the Democratic nominees in the hope to win by the ballot what they could not win by the bullet. Pollard is writing of "The Lost Cause Regained." Wade Hampton reminds the men of Baltimore of the time when the sons of Maryland swept across the border and stood side by side with South Carolina in the glorious army of Northern Virginia. Cheers for Davis and Lee and the rebel leaders mingle with the shouts for Seymour and Blair. The Democracy, separated for four years by the bayonets of the boys in blue, rushes together, trampling alike over the graves of three hundred and fifty thousand dead heroes and of the principles for which they fell. But these now exultant and commingling hosts of the Democracy will go down beneath the aroused patriotism and withering scorn of the American people on the 3d of November, and the cause of patriotism, liberty, and justice will triumph under our great leader.

The Senator tells us that we have had here, until they have made his heart sick, stories of the outrages perpetrated upon the loyal men and upon the freedmen in the southern States. Sir, those tales of woe have made the heart of the nation sick, and I should think the heart of the Senator from Indiana would be sick, too; but when he raises doubts about their authenticity it only goes to show that the Senator has, like the men of other days, cast from him the evidence that presses upon him from every quarter of the heavens. I remember in 1855 and 1856 when the plains of Kansas were reddened with blood, when the midnight skies were illumined by the burning dwellings of the actual settlers, when the House of Representatives sent the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] and other members to investigate and report the facts transpiring in that then distant Territory, there were men in the House of Representatives and there were men in the Senate who scoffed and jeered and scouted at all the statements made in regard to the outrages perpetrated upon the settlers of that Territory. But their sneers, their jeers, their denials could not extinguish the truths of history. That committee reported the facts; those facts and other facts have gone into the history of the country, and men read them now and blush for those who perpetrated those crimes and for those who apologized for the perpetrators. During the last three years there have been tens of thousands of wrongs and outrages perpetrated in the States lately in rebellion. Your Freedmen's Bureau office is full of the evidences of them; General Holt's office is full of the evidences of them, enough to make the blood curdle in the veins of every human being. The Senator from West Virginia last night read us a report made in the constitutional convention of Texas showing a condition of affairs in that State which makes an American who loves his country, who respects law and order, hang his head in very shame. Has not the Senator from Indiana heard of the riots at Memphis, of the bloody massacre at New Orleans, where sixty-nine cart-loads of murdered, outraged, and wounded human beings were borne away, and where the city authorities paid for sixty-nine cart-loads of mutilated humanity?

Sir, we not only know these things to be true, but we have striven night and day, by law, by every means within our power, to protect the weak, black and white, to maintain law and order and good government, to instruct the ignorant, to lift up the poor and the lowly, to protect the defenseless and the powerless. In word and in act we have striven with all the means in our power to make the rebel States as safe for life, liberty, and property as the most favored section of our country, and every day we have been met in this Chamber and the other by misrepresentations of our motives and purposes, by denunciations of military power, by talks about despotism, when the whole people in those States—the poor and the lowly, the black and the oppressed—have had more liberty, bad as things were, than they had for years before.

Ah, sir, but the Senator tells us that we have pardoned some rebels, we have pardoned some men whose hands have been red with blood. Yes, sir, we have, and we would pardon the whole of them if they would give us evidence of repentance, if they would manifest a disposition to forget and forgive. But let me say that the men whom we have pardoned are men who were proving by their daily lives and conversation, by all the influence they could exert, that they have given up the rebellion as a lost cause, that they want peace and law and order, and the moral, intellectual, and material development of their section of country. That is what the men we have pardoned and who unite with us want. They do not want any more war; they do not want any more slavery; they do not want any more wrong and outrage; but they are willing to unite with the men who represent the higher and better sentiments of the American people, the men who have saved this nation, emancipated a race, given rights to the poor and lowly, lifted up the oppressed, and who are striving to make every square rood of the Territory of the United States the home of liberty and peace and order and justice.

Sir, that is what we have been struggling for, and yet by day and by night in the other House and in this Chamber we have been opposed by the men who sympathized with this rebellion, this armed rebellion, this rebellion of the Democratic party. Remember that every drop of loyal blood shed in this war was shed by the apostasy of the Democratic party to the cause of patriotism and liberty. They talk to us of patriotism and liberty! Sir, the history of the last seven years is as black as midnight by the deeds and utterances of men who are ever blurring their Democracy into the ear of the country. They talk of their devotion to human rights, and yet they have fought and voted against every law that has been passed and every deed that has been wrought which tended to strike off fetters from men's limbs, to make men free, and to secure or to guard human rights. Now, because we are striving peacefully and loyally to build up the States that have been in rebellion, to build them up on the basis of liberty and justice to all men, to build them up so that God will bless and Heaven will pour its richest blessings on them, because we are striving to do right, we are held up before the country as attempting to influence the election by putting arms in the hands of a portion of our people. Sir, we have no occasion to resort to menaces. We have something stronger than the two million and a half rifled muskets or the two million and a half of glittering bayonets in the arsenals of the United States. We have justice and truth on our side. We have our grand and glorious history; a history full of deeds of patriotism and liberty and justice and humanity; a record brighter, fairer, purer, clearer, holier than the record of any political party that ever trod the universe. The world knows it; history records it, and the nations accord it while we are living. We have something stronger than bayonets; we have the cause of patriotism. We have behind us that for which the noblest and best of earth have died in the dungeon and on the scaffold and the battlefield, the cause of equal, universal, and impartial liberty. We have the cause of justice, the cause of humanity, and we bear in the western world the cause of Christian civilization. We have with us the hopes and the prayers of all the champions of human liberty throughout the globe. We have with us the utterances of the philosophers, the poets, and the statesmen of all the ages. We have with us the truths embodied in God's Holy Word, and we believe we have with us the blessings of that Being who has carried us through the fire and blood of the last seven years, who has made a mockery of the acts and professions of those who have assailed us on the battle-fields and in the councils of the nation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, when I submitted this ordinary motion at this period of the session to provide for an adjournment on a given day, I did it in full faith that Senators on both sides of the Chamber, the House of Representatives, and the President of the United States, would in the usual way enable us to close the business of the session. I presumed that the President of the United States would, according to the established custom, appear here and sign or disapprove any bills that were sent to him, and that members on both sides would confine themselves to the necessary business of this session of Congress, and thus without unnecessary delay or political discussion, we might be able to close this session in the ordinary way on next Friday. And, sir, there is nothing in the condition of the public business that should prevent us from acting upon every bill, action on which is absolutely necessary, by next Friday. All the ordinary appropriation bills which crowd upon the attention of the Senate, are out of the way; nothing is left but a few bills considered of vital importance, upon which we must have the assent or dissent of the President of the United States. When I submitted the motion, it was in the full faith that the President, although now spoken for here by those who did not speak for him formerly, would either approve or disapprove any bill presented for his consideration. But, sir, I never will press a motion of this kind when a declaration is made here by authority that the President intends to avail himself of a constitutional provision to defeat the will of Congress.

If the President of the United States, according to the threat now made by the Senator from Indiana, will hold our bill in his hands ten days or any indefinite time for the purpose of defeating the action of Congress, then I am willing to take him at his word, and I will stay here by him through summer's heat and through winter's cold, and never leave him until he approves or disapproves every act which the Representatives of the people, and the representatives of the States deem necessary for the public safety. This is not the kind of language to be uttered either in the Senate or in the House. If the President wishes to have us here, let us stay; and if the President will resort to the extraordinary expedient of withholding his action upon a bill which we deem vital to the peace of this country, then I, for one, will not propose an adjournment until every act which we deem necessary for the public safety has received his sanction, or meeting his disapproval, shall have had the action of Congress again.

I do think, however, that the Senator from Indiana went beyond what he was authorized to say, when he stated that the President could and would do, and what he would justify him in doing; but at present, in the face of this threat, I am not disposed to press this motion until I know whether or not the Senator from Indiana speaks in the name of the President of the United States, and for him, or merely indulges in partisan declamation.

If the Senator from Indiana had been here last night, I believe he never would have made the speech he has made to-day. I think he was not here when the bill of which he has spoken was debated at great length. The debate was led off by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and what was the result of it? The bill enacts no new principle; nothing but what is now the law of the land. There is not a word in the section which the Senator has read that is not now in existing law except the word "loyal" is introduced as descriptive of the character of the militia organizations to whom arms are to be furnished. The provisions of law now require every year $200,000 worth of muskets to be distributed among the States in precisely the manner pointed out in the bill. That is a permanent, standing appropriation, not depending on the annual assent of Congress.

Mr. NYE. And has been since 1808.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has been the permanent and established policy of this Government every year to distribute a certain number of arms among the different States and in the precise proportion provided in this bill. There was a departure from the precedent as it was originally drawn, and the honorable Senator from Rhode Island called attention to it and it was changed so that the section now read here is in hæc verba the law of the land. Indiana, if she applies, has a right to demand her share of the arms distributed according to law. This appropriation has stood for years unchallenged. Not only that, it has been considered so vital to arm the people of the United States against insurrection or invasion that it is transferred from the ordinary annual appropriations of Congress to the permanent appropriations which stand and continue year in and year out without change and without regard to the condition of the Treasury. The Governor of Indiana may this day demand Indiana's share of these arms, and so may each of the other States.

The honorable Senator from Massachusetts in opening this matter stated that we were about to diminish the Army twenty-three thousand men, at a saving of over twenty million dollars a year; that a large portion of the troops would be withdrawn from certain of the insurrectionary States where civil authority had been again established, and he said to us that the loyal civil authorities in those States had no arms, no ammunition, no money, no means of defense. The honorable Senator from West Virginia read a statement showing that in the single State of Texas, where the rebel authorities still control matters, over nine hundred persons had been unlawfully killed in the last three years. In other States the same lawless violence prevails. A statement was made that the loyal people of the southern States had no arms, while the disloyal, those who were not satisfied with the new governments organized by law, have arms and are now murdering and robbing and plundering the people. Why, sir, who was not startled by the terrible case that occurred in the second most populous city of the State of Georgia, where young men in the highest rank of society marched at midnight, some twenty or thirty of them, and killed in cold blood a native Georgian because he was a Radical? and it appears in the testimony given on the trial of the murderers of Mr. Ashburn that the women and the men there said that what these young men did was right, although they committed what God and man in every other portion of the civilized world would pronounce willful and deliberate murder!

With such a state of opinion in the southern States is it not our duty to protect the loyal people there who have accepted the reconstruction acts of Congress, who have reorganized civil governments there? Is it not our duty when we withdraw our Army to enable them to protect themselves, to furnish them money, arms, and munitions of war for their own defense? Sir, there is no danger of these reconstructed governments being guilty of any oppression of the people among them. There is no evidence of any such intention; and if they are armed with the few muskets provided for by this bill they will scarcely be on terms of equality with those who have probably now half a million arms in their hands left as the debris of the war and scattered all over that vast region of country, and still in the possession of those who lately used them in war against the United States.

I am sure that if the Senator from Indiana had been here last night and heard the discussion he would not have objected to the bill. Why, sir, how many arms does it give to any State? Take the most powerful of them all, the State of Georgia; she gets but nine thousand stand of arms. They are to be given to whom? To companies of militia organized into regiments according to law, and that militia cannot be called into action except in case of insurrection or such riotous conduct as would overcome and subvert the officers of the law, and then these reconstructed governments ought to have the power forcibly to put down force and violence.

No increased expenditure is involved. The arms are on hand, two million of them, and this bill distributes among the States one eighth of the supply; and it may as well be understood first as last that the governments of those States now restored to their old places in the Union and controlled by those who are willing to abide by the result of the war will be maintained in spite of the muttered threats of unrepenting rebels or the demands of the Democratic party, which hopes by an alliance with the rebels of the South to regain their lost political power.

Sir, I did not dream when I submitted this motion, when I was looking to the ordinary termination of this session of Congress, that the honorable Senator from Indiana would come here and make a speech partisan in its character, the inevitable tendency of which is to prolong the session and to unjustly excite against Congress the contempt and hatred and indignation of the people of the United States. The speech was out of place and out of time. If he had been here last night it might have been appropriate on the bill we were then considering, however unjust his reasoning; but now the question is on fixing the day of adjournment. A period of the session has arrived when it is usual for all branches of the Government to work in harmony, and yet he tells us that the President of the United States would be justified, in order to defeat an important legislative measure—one that will save $20,000,000 a year, admitted to be constitutional and in accordance with the old policy of the Government—to refuse his assent or dissent, and thus, by his delay, to compel us to choose between neglecting a plain public duty or of prolonging the session. I can only say that if this is the game I shall vote for no adjournment until the President's ten days are exhausted on every bill we deem necessary for the public safety. Although quite exhausted by this terrible heat, and anxious to get away, I am not willing to go until I see a spirit on the part of the President of the United States, and those who are his friends here, to close this session in the ordinary way, to give us his sanction or his judgment on our action without delay. Until then I am not disposed to press any question of adjournment. But, sir, I believe the Senator merely sounds a partisan bugle. I believe the President will do what it has been usual to do, give his assent or dissent to any measure that we pass. Such has always been his practice. It was only in that belief, only with that view, that I submitted this motion, and I am now not disposed to withdraw it, but under the circumstances will allow it to stand as it is until to-morrow. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that will not be done yet. We have not time now for an executive session before the recess.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. I will give way to the Senator if he wishes to speak.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not rise of course to extend this debate—

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before this matter passes from the attention of the Senate I wish to make a few remarks in reply to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CONNESS. I gave way to the honorable Senator from Maine to make a report. I prefer saying a few words now myself, and a very few.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the deficiency bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received and read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered ten, nineteen, twenty-one, and twenty-two.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered one, two, three, four, five, six, eight, nine, fourteen, sixteen, seventeen, and twenty, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words: "Provided, That said expenditures shall not be applied to any works not mentioned in the bill making appropriations for repairs, preservation, and completion of certain public works, and for other purposes," which passed the House of Representatives June 30, 1868; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eleventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in lieu of the words stricken out by the Senate insert the following words: "Provided, That the sum shall be in full of all claims against the Government for work done or damages incurred on the Washington aqueduct;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twelfth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: At the end of said amendment add the following words: "To be expended under the immediate direction of the officer detailed to act as Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Rock Island arsenal:

"For the erection of a bridge to connect Rock Island arsenal with the city of Rock Island, Illinois, $100,000, said bridge to be constructed and completed for the sum hereby appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu of said Senate amendment the following words: "ten thousand one hundred and eighty dollars and sixty-three cents: Provided, That nothing shall be paid except subject to existing provisions of law, and upon the finding and certificate of the Third Auditor that the same is actually due;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: add to said amendment the following: "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated for this purpose shall be paid until the accounts for feeding such destitute Indians shall be fully investigated by a commission, to consist of Lieutenant General William T. Sherman, Major General P. H. Sheridan, and Major General C. C. Augur; and the said commission is hereby authorized, for the purpose of such investigation, to call and examine witnesses in this behalf, and only the amount that said commission shall certify to be equitably and justly due shall be paid; and said commission shall sit at Leavenworth, Kansas, and shall have power to appoint a clerk at a salary of five dollars per day for the time actually employed, and the sum of $1,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary for clerk hire, traveling and incidental expenses of said commission, is hereby appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in lieu of the word stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no contract shall be entered into for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement whatever which shall bind the Government to pay a larger sum of money than the amount in the Treasury appropriated for the specific purpose; and if any officer of the Government shall knowingly contract for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction shall be punished by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years, and shall pay a fine of $2,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment after the word "dollars" in line fourteen to the end of the amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

L. M. MORRILL,
ROSCOE CONKLING,
J. R. DOOLITTLE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
E. B. WASHBURN,
W. H. KELSEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adjournment resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not intend at this hour—

Mr. CONNESS. I believe I had the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Senator from Indiana was recognized by the Chair as entitled to the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I yielded the floor for the purpose of allowing a report to be made from a conference committee.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall occupy but a very few minutes.

Mr. CONNESS. If I am entitled to the floor I desire to go on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is that when a Senator yields the floor he loses it at the option of anybody else who gets it, unless he yields for some specific and limited purpose.

Mr. CONNESS. Was not the matter to which I yielded a privileged matter? Now, will the Chair be so kind as to tell me how I lost the floor?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will have no sort of controversy about the floor. Of course the Senator can take it.

Mr. CONNESS. Ordinarily, Mr. President, I would make no contest for the floor with the honorable Senator from Indiana, but after listening to the speech that he made I did not feel that the few remaining moments of this day's session, if I was entitled to the floor, should be given to him for the purpose of mere personal explanation. I take it for granted that the speech which he made was deliberately made and for political reasons. I intended to begin by expressing my thanks to the honorable Senator from Ohio for the speech he has made, and the course he has taken in regard to this question of adjournment. I differ a little with my honorable friend from Ohio in doubting that the purpose of the Senator from Indiana, as representing the purpose of the party that he is a member of, and the President of the United States also, does not include offering all the obstructions that can now be offered to the establishment of the public peace.

It is plain to me the messages that we have been receiving from the President of the United States for the last two weeks, the proclamation which he has issued, are of such a character as to justify this conclusion. They are incendiary; they are violative of his public duty; they are a scandal, in my judgment, before the civilized world; and, sir, in place of discussing a question of adjournment at this time, they would justify rather the impeachment of that official by the other House of Congress, and his trial by this, and his expulsion from the place that he fills.

Mr. President, it is not long since he escaped conviction and expulsion from that place by the merest chance in the world. The character of his conduct in connection with these proclamations, the character of the communications that have come from the first minister of his Cabinet, the character of the political convention that he has joined his interests with, its utterances, the class of men that composed it, the letter of one of the candidates of that party, and the emanation of that convention threatening rebellion again in this country, all justify what I say, and it will become in all probability the duty of Congress to stay here until they shall be able by their action to guaranty peace to this nation.

I say to the Senator from Indiana, for one, that the threats he has made here I would meet upon the threshold. Let any party dissatisfied with the result of a popular election again in this country, as they were dissatisfied when Mr. Lincoln was first elected, renew the rebellion, and that rebellion will be fought out in a manner not characterized by the past.

The honorable Senator in discussing the utterance of General Grant in accepting the national nomination for the Presidency quoted him as saying, "Let us have peace." We all reëcho that sentiment and say, "Let us have peace." We want peace; we ask and beg and plead for peace; but we can have peace only upon condition of obedience to law. The President of the United States is amenable to law; but he sets the example here by his communications and his utterances of disorder in the country; and in my humble judgment if we shall adjourn and leave the capital it will not be long before we shall have disorder reëstablished in the country. I hope, sir, that we shall seriously consider the proposition, and I am glad that the question of adjournment is at least temporarily put off.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, if it be the pleasure of the Senate to extend the time for taking recess for ten minutes I shall be gratified.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope it will be extended ten minutes.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope not. Under ordinary circumstances I would not object, but now I must object.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the time be extended ten minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved and seconded that the time for the recess be extended ten minutes.

The question being put there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 11; not a quorum voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will vote no if it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Kansas to withdraw the motion if there is any disinclination to allowing me to reply in a few words to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMEROY. Very well, it will come up this evening. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate, according to order, will now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments; and

A bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of navigation in the Mississippi river.

CHINA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 104. It is very brief, and the Post Office Committee request me to call the early attention of the Senate to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the joint resolution will be taken up.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 104) relating to the ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China authorized by act of Congress, approved February 17, 1865, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that in the settlement of the quarterly accounts of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for service performed as contractors for the ocean mail steamship service between the United States and China, authorized by act approved February 17, 1865, the full amount of the mail subsidy of $500,000 per annum granted by the law and contract shall be paid to the company in quarterly payments during the first three years of the contract term, although the full monthly service required by the contract may not be rendered; but at least two round trips conveying the mails of the United States are hereafter to be performed in each quarter, for which such payment is authorized. The company are in advance of such payments to execute a bond to the Government, with good and sufficient sureties satisfactory to the Postmaster General, conditional that the company will well and faithfully perform the full number of round trips called for by the law and contract; that is to say, that for each monthly trip omitted during the first three years of the contract term, an additional trip, in regular monthly succession, conveying the mails of the United States, shall be performed without compensation immediately after the termination of the contract. The company is also to obligate itself to convey the mails of the United States, without claim for additional compensation, by any steamship or steamships which may, during the continuance of the contract, be placed upon the route for the performance of a more frequent service to and from Japan and China than the monthly service stipulated by the contract.

The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads proposed to amend the resolution by striking out in line twenty-four the words "in regular monthly succession," and inserting "beyond those now required by law and contract."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee also proposed after the word "compensation," in line twenty-seven, to strike out "immediately after the termination of the contract," and insert:

"Within five years from the passage of this act for each of the trips already omitted, and an additional trip conveying said mails shall be performed without compensation for each trip hereafter omitted within three years from the date of each omitted trip."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLE. I was not in when this joint resolution was called up, and I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain this measure if he has not already done so.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will make the explanation if the honorable Senator desires it. The act of 1865 required this company to make twelve round trips a year, for which they were to get a subsidy of $500,000. It was impossible for them immediately to make monthly trips, because the vessels were not all prepared. The vessels required are large and expensive; probably the largest that float on any sea in the world. They were compelled to omit two trips a quarter, making eight a year, and of course they were not paid for those trips. The proposition now is, in order to enable them to get along in this great enterprise, to pay them this money on their giving security that they will perform these trips within five years of the omission which has taken place in time past, and within three years of any omission hereafter; and they will in time to come carry a mail on every trip without additional expense to the Government. Probably they will carry a mail semi-monthly and finally weekly, and they are to carry it each time they make a trip. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads gave this measure a great deal of attention, and thought the Government would gain very largely by it.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if there is a provision in the joint resolution as amended requiring the company to carry the mails every trip the vessels make?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir; here it is:

That the said company shall also obligate itself to convey the mails of the United States, without claim for additional compensation, by any steamship or steamships which may, during the continuance of the contract, be placed upon the route for the performance of a more frequent service to and from Japan and China, than the monthly service stipulated by the contract.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

SYMPATHY FOR CRETE.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senate will take up House bill No. 39. It is only seven lines long. It is to authorize the settlement of the accounts of an officer. The time occupied in reading the bill will be all that will be consumed by it.

Mr. MORTON. There are a number of Senators who have little bills that will take but a moment. This evening was set apart for a particular purpose. I do not want to engage in a struggle for the floor, and I am not going to do it. If the bill for which the evening was set apart is to be taken up, well and good; if not, I will not go into a perpetual struggle for the floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe I have the floor myself. I was entitled to it when the recess was taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This evening was set apart for the consideration of a bill providing for bridges across the Ohio river.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to be allowed to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Thereport will be received if there be no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I send to the Chair a joint resolution which I am directed to report by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 169) appealing to the Turkish Government in behalf of the people of Crete was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, this joint resolution has the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. It will cause no debate. I believe every Senator will rejoice to have it adopted. I therefore ask that it may be passed upon now.

Mr. FERRY. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. FERRY. I endeavored to get up a bill, but objection was made.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senate to proceed with Senate bill No. 622.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his objection. I hope, therefore, that the joint resolution which I reported may be acted upon now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It cannot be.

Mr. SUMNER. It will take only a moment.

Mr. MORTON. There are a number of Senators requesting me to yield, and if I yield to one I must yield to others.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will allow the resolution to be read and then voted upon.

Mr. MORTON. It can be passed to-morrow without trouble.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; it may be difficult to get the floor to-morrow. There the resolution is, and I entreat the Senate to act on it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is it about?

Mr. SUMNER. It is a resolution from the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate with reference to Crete; I know it will have the sympathy of the Senator. I ask that the resolution be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The resolution was read at length, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the people of the United States renew the expression of their sympathy with the suffering people of Crete, to whom they are bound by ties of a common religion, and by the gratitude due to the Greek race, of which the Cretans are a part; that they rejoice to believe that the sufferings of this interesting people may be happily terminated by a policy of forbearance on the part of the Turkish Government, and they hereby declare their earnest hope that the Turkish Government will listen kindly to this representation, and will speedily adopt such generous steps as will secure to Crete the much-desired blessings of peace, and the advantage of autonomic government.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That religion, civilization, and humanity require that the existing contest in Crete should be brought to a close, and to accomplish this result the civilized Powers of the world should unite in friendly influence with the Government of Turkey.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That it shall be the duty of the President to instruct the minister of the United States at Constantinople to cooperate with the ministers of other Powers in all good offices to terminate the sufferings of the people of Crete; and that it shall be the further duty of the President to communicate a copy of this resolution to the Government of Turkey.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 622) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Ohio river is the business of the evening. That bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] to the amendment of the committee, proposing to fill the blanks in the first section of the bill.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Mr. President, I feel, of course, a very strong interest in this bill, as I have already manifested, and in the amendment that is now proposed. In such a sweltering night as this I do not know that I have either strength of body or strength of mind to make myself understood. I will endeavor to do so, however, briefly.

I stated this morning that an opinion had been insinuated here that this bill, first with its provision for five hundred and two hundred and fifty feet spans, expressed the views of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; second, that the bill itself had their approbation; and thirdly, that the bill was in accordance with the suggestions of General Warren, of the engineer department of the United States. I think that neither of these is true; and I mention it lest the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, or, as he says, by the committee, of which I had no knowledge, may derive some strength from such considerations.

Mr. MORTON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that he made that statement two or three days ago, and was immediately corrected by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. As to filling the blanks? I am not aware of any correction.

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the statement?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I say the committee did not authorize the filling of those blanks so far as I know.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator is mistaken about that. The bill was reported in the first instance with the blanks, with the understanding that after the bill should be printed it should be recommitted to the committee with a view of filling the blanks. After that I consulted the members of the committee in the way we usually do at the close of the session when there is no time for a formal meeting of the committee, and had authority from the members to report that the blanks should be filled with five hundred feet and two hundred and fifty feet respectively.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The Senator from Kansas and myself are members of the committee, and we were not consulted. However, sir, I shall not dwell upon that point. When I called on the clerk, to begin with, to know if the bill had been recommitted, he told me it had not been. It was reported on the 16th. That cannot affect the result in any way except in the way I have indicated; it might be supposed that the committee had given it a thorough examination, and had come to the conclusion that five hundred feet span was necessary.

I have said that this bill is not strictly in accordance with the recommendation of General Warren, and therefore does not derive any support from the authority of his great name. His letter to the chairman of the Post Office Committee giving his views on the subject is now before the Senate. The report reached us, I think, while I was speaking on Saturday, or at any rate I saw it as soon as I was done. General Warren does not say that a bridge should be five hundred feet span. In his recommendations as to the mode in which a bill should be framed—and he makes a great many very good suggestions on that point—he says:

"Whatever may be the least limit adopted for the width of the passage-way for boats, I would recommend that the following provisions be required in all cases to secure it."

He does not, therefore, regard a five hundred feet span as indispensable. On the contrary, there is that in his letter, or report, whichever it may be called, which goes to contradict that opinion. He speaks of the Steubenville bridge, of which so much has been said, erected under the law passed in 1862 as we supposed, but he finds that that bridge has not been erected in accordance with the requirements of the law, or rather that additions have been made to it which destroy what the law intended to secure. He says, for instance, that instead of the span being three hundred feet wide, the piers and the abutments have been ripped apart to that extent that the passage under the main channel span has been actually reduced to about two hundred and fifty feet, which is, of course, altering it very materially. He says also that the bridge is placed very badly, so as not receive the current fairly, and he says if they had gone a mile and a half further down the river an unobjectionable place might have been secured. So that the accidents which are said to have occurred at the Steubenville bridge are not in consequence of that bridge being built on the plan prescribed by law, but of a want of integrity in following it out.

There is another departure, as I think, from General Warren's recommendation in this bill, as to which I have prepared an amendment that I will offer as soon as the pending amendment is disposed of. According to this bill as it reads all the spans clear across the river, except the middle channel span, which is to be five hundred feet, are to be two hundred and fifty feet. There is nothing of that kind in General Warren's letter. The only thing from which it can be supposed that his opinion is favorable to a five hundred feet span bridge is an estimate that he made before for such a bridge. He makes a calculation for a five hundred feet span over the main channel, and then for two spans of three hundred feet each adjoining it on each side, but he leaves the residue to be made, I suppose, at the convenience of the bridge company, as it necessarily must be, because rivers do not divide accurately into certain numbers of feet, and besides that, many of these other spans are in the water-way near the shore, where it is of no consequence as to their width. I propose to amend this bill at least in that particular, and to follow, whatever the figures may be, the plan adopted in the previous law, which requires only one span to be of great width, which is certainly sufficient for the purposes of navigation.

I must, while I am up, notice a little that has been said on the other side.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] is very fond of saying that we are about to build cheap bridges. Why, sir, the bridges to which he refers will cost considerably over half a million dollars apiece. They will cost, I think, almost as much as this estimate here for a bridge of five hundred feet span, which, I believe, cannot be built for less than over a million dollars. We have also had some strange stories about the navigation of the Ohio river. The Senator from Indiana has a faculty which I do not claim to possess, and therefore admire the more; he makes large assertions stand in the place of law and fact. When the last day of this month shall have arrived it will be precisely one third of a century since I went to live on the Ohio river. I have lived within sight of it. The room that I principally inhabit looks out upon it. The Senator has seen many things on the Ohio river that never yet met my eye. He has seen a fleet of coal boats six hundred feet long propelled by a little stern-wheel steamer in the rear which has not the power to steer herself and could not steer a lot of coal boats. He wants to let a fleet of coal boats six hundred feet long propelled by a little stern-wheel steamer go under the bridge. There is no necessity for that; it cannot be at all. That is not the way it is done. They take a very powerful steamer, and always a side-wheel steamer, and put that with one row of boats in front and the rest at the side and behind, and then she has some little command of her fleet; she would have none at all if she were placed at the rear, and especially a stern-wheeler that has but one wheel, and of course cannot steer with it, whereas a side-wheel boat by stopping one wheel and working the other can get her head around sometimes.

I do not know that it is of any use to dilate on this question, but there are other matters in connection with the navigation of the Ohio river stated here as absurd as that was. Gentlemen talk of a fleet of coal boats two hundred and sixty-two feet front and over six hundred feet long. I inquired of Mr. Engineer Roberts on that point. He was very kind and very polite in answering all questions. In his written report he seems to labor most, as do all these engineers, to prove the practicability of a five hundred feet span, as if that were at least a doubtful matter. I asked him what was the greatest width of these fleets of coal boats, and he told me one hundred and forty feet. That I believe is the width with a steamer and two rows of boats on each side abreast. The body of engineers whose report I alluded to the other day fixed the greatest width at one hundred and twenty-five feet, and as I endeavored then to show three hundred feet passage-way must be enough for a fleet one hundred and forty feet wide to go through. No steamboat has ever stuck at the Steubenville bridge, but if the coal boats stick there with only two hundred and fifty feet passage-way, it is because there is not water enough on those rip-raps, according to General Warren, for anything to pass over their top until there is fifteen feet of water in the river.

There is another mistake in regard to this. Gentlemen talk of the current of the Ohio river. Parkersburg, where I live, is two thousand miles from the mouth of the Mississippi, and it is just five hundred feet above tide-water. Consequently the descent of the water in the Ohio and Mississippi rivers for two thousand miles averages but three inches a mile—not likely to produce a very strong current. The Senator says that the current at the bridge, supposing it to be somewhat increased by the narrowing of the passage, is two and three eighths miles an hour, and he does not pretend that it is any more. He says what I never heard of before, however, that at the height of a freshet the current is six miles per hour. I never before heard it estimated at more than four miles. At any rate, the fact is well known that there is no such current in the river, except at a high freshet, as would render the current any way strong. He says that makes it a source of danger because steamboats have to put on steam in order to get way enough on them to steer. I do not agree with him that that necessarily increases their danger. The fact is that no boats, and especially no coal boats, go on the top of high water. In high water the stream is always higher in the middle than on the sides, and naturally they are thrown off. But they start just as the river begins to fall. That is the case on all these rivers that are navigated by flood boats. When the water begins to fall the boats are started, and then the channel is depressed, and they stick to it without any difficulty whatever.

I have heard nothing that goes to show that there is any peculiar danger in this navigation. If the spans of the bridge are as wide as the natural channel of the river, and that is not contested at a certain stage of water, the spans are certainly wide enough for the accommodation of the boats. These long arrays of six hundred feet that are talked of are very seldom seen, and they are not adapted to the navigation of the river, because the river has sudden bends. There is quite a sharp bend at Parkersburg, and I apprehend that if the Senator's six hundred feet of coal boats with a stern-wheeler behind them come there they would go ashore on the lower side. They cannot want more accommodation at the bridge than they have in the channel of the river.

The Senator speaks of the Ohio having a width of water of eleven hundred feet. That is when the river is full to its banks. He says that this navigation is extended for seven months in the year. Sir, nobody ever saw that for more than seven days at a time. The coal boats, as this engineer told me, draw ten feet, and the steamer draws eight feet, and that is all the water they want. And when there is no more water in the river than is needed for their purpose, I apprehend the channel is not over three hundred feet, unless at very favorable places.

I do not wish to consume time, not seeing any good that is to come from it; but I should be glad if I were able to make the Senate understand this subject as it appears to me. What we offer is to go on according to the law under which the bridges now in process of construction have been commenced; and if the Steubenville bridge is not built according to the law let it be forced to conform itself to the law; but we wish to go on under the law that was passed in 1862, and under which we have been acting now for nearly two years, in preparing for this work, and be allowed to complete our bridges on that plan. That is what we ask, and I shall offer an amendment to except the bridges above Parkersburg from the operation of this bill. There is nothing in the other provisions of the bill which we should object to. Our channels are straight above and below, and there is nothing in this bill which we should not have anticipated aside from the points I have indicated. In the first place the span is broader than is necessary, and, as was remarked by the Senator from Kansas this morning, here is width, or as the engineers call it, a length of span of five hundred feet which, according to them, is yet an experiment. They have deemed it necessary in all their publications on this subject to spend much effort in arguing that it is practicable, not to use, but to build a bridge with five hundred feet span. They consider that so far a doubtful point that they expand themselves mostly upon that. As was justly observed by the Senator from Kansas, there is nothing in existence by which they can test it. There is no case in this country where any railroad company has built a bridge with five hundred feet span, unless a suspension bridge.

Now, in regard to suspension bridges, I have never seen the one at Niagara; but I know that when an ordinary wagon goes over a suspension bridge it rises right up in front of it; and to tell me that such a bridge is competent to bear railroad trains going over it at any rate of speed which is usual is more than I am inclined to believe at present. The bridge at Wheeling was built by Mr. Ellett, and it has been turned upside down. They say now they can stay such bridges by artificial stays fastened to them and to the shore. The bridge at Wheeling was fastened just in that way; and on one occasion, when a drove of cattle was crossing, something scared them when they were about one third of the way over, and they began going round and round, and piling in, as cattle will, making a perfect stampede, and the bridge was very violently agitated, and these stays of iron snapped like pipe-stems. I do not believe railroad cars can go over a suspension bridge with any speed, with any regard for safety; and I want to know whether, until that experiment has been made in some satisfactory form, the Senate is prepared to vote that railroad trains carrying four or five hundred human beings as passengers are to be put upon a structure ninety feet above the water, and extending from pier to pier five hundred feet without support. That is the question for consideration, but the question is still stronger than that: are you going to pass a bill which provides that this dangerous length shall be the minimum? That is what you are required to say when you are asked to make the span five hundred feet.

There is another thing about this matter, and I saw it treated very gingerly in some of these reports, though I had a conversation with engineer Roberts about it. He spoke of the five hundred feet span. I told him what my views were, and he declared that it would have to be much more weighty in order to obtain the required strength for the increased length. This of course would greatly enhance the cost, making it more than double. I am told, also, that the piers to sustain it at each end must be much larger than those necessary to sustain a three hundred feet span. He got over that by saying that they would not be longer in proportion; but the strength must be in proportion, and if you are going to risk the erection of such a structure I should think you would want something more than lead pencil figures on paper to know how you could make it.

I contend that in the narrow channel of the Ohio river the introduction of two large piers must necessarily afford more obstruction to the channel than the three ordinary-sized piers would do. In fact, I do not see that anything is to be gained for anybody by this bill, except that perhaps the pilots and steersmen of the coal boats may not have to attend to their business quite as closely as they ought to attend to it. Anybody who sees coal boats stowed up along the Ohio river on almost every shoal will see that they are not very careful. It is no new thing for coal boats to be stuck. I have already described how ill adapted they are for steering, how clumsily they are built, how laboriously they are managed. They were made in that way originally, because when a boat went down the river and delivered her cargo she was sold and broken up. It did not pay at that time to construct regular coal barges or those which would steer with more ease; but it is in the power of those who have engaged in this business, now that they have introduced steamboats for tows, to build fine boats, good boats, to carry their coal, and, as they now do in many cases, to tow them back again, though they have little to bring back except their empty boats.

Now, sir, what I ask of the Senate is that they will take this subject into serious consideration. I ask them to give us a chance, according to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, to go before the Secretary of War and his board of engineers to ascertain whether the three hundred feet span which we are already preparing to build, by getting ready the iron, the materials for the top, and by the commencement of the piers, will answer. If they are willing to give us the chance of the verdict of a board, composed as that is to be, holding that that is sufficient for the navigation of the river, then they will vote for this amendment of the Senator from Kansas, and let us have three hundred feet as a minimum span, to be increased if that shall be the view of the board of engineers appointed by the Secretary of War. I will also ask to have the other spans altered in accordance with what has been usual, not that every span across the river shall be of equal width, but that an adjoining span to the main-channel span shall be of a width suited to it.

Mr. MORTON. My friend from West Virginia thought proper to say that I had the gift of making round assertions, a gift that he was not possessed of.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I said the Senator had the gift of making them stand in place of fact and laws.

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator is able to point to a single assertion I have made in regard to these bridges that is not sustained by the evidence I will give him the floor and let him point it out. As an illustration of my round assertions, he said that he had lived—I do not know how many years—overlooking the Ohio river, from which I suppose he would have us infer that he knows all about that river and its commerce, and all about bridging necessary; and he denied the statement I had made that these tows were pushed by stern-wheel steamboats. He said they were pushed by side-wheel steamers of powerful construction. Whether the tows are pushed by side-wheelers or stern-wheelers is not very material to this argument; but I am advised by one who certainly knows more about the river than the Senator does, as it has been his business to navigate it for many years, that he does not know of a single side-wheeled steam tow-boat on the river. They are all stern-wheelers, and powerful boats. This is not an important matter; but when my friend talks about "round assertions" and his room overlooking the Ohio river he ought to know something about it.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Will the gentleman tell me how his assertion can be true? How does a stern-wheeler steer? Does she steer by the wheel?

Mr. MORTON. I am not a pilot; I do not know how they steer with their wheels; but the Senator said they were side-wheelers and not stern-wheelers. My friend must look a little sharper when he looks at the river. I am told he is entirely mistaken in what he said as to the character of the boats. But that is not very important.

A word now in regard to another assertion. The Senator from Kansas to-day in his zeal said the bridge at St. Louis had been abandoned. Here I must remark that I have observed the tactics by which this bill has been kept off, first in the committee of which the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from West Virginia are members, for several months, and has been kept off now until the latest moment in the session. By these tactics the morning hour was consumed on Saturday and the morning hour was consumed to-day. I must say that these tactics are something I do not approve of. The Senator from Kansas this morning said that the five hundred feet span at St. Louis had been abandoned and Captain Eads had gone to Europe.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not say the bridge had been abandoned; I said Captain Eads had gone to Europe.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the Senator to say that the bridge had been abandoned. It was of no importance whether Captain Eads was going to Europe or not if the bridge was going on. I understood the Senator to state that the bridge had been abandoned, and that Captain Eads had gone off to Europe. We telegraphed to St. Louis to know if that statement was true, and we have received an answer saying no. The person who sent the dispatch said that he called on the secretary and the vice president of the bridge company, and they said the bridge was going on, and going on well; that Captain Eads was about to sail for Europe for a time on account of his health. That is a very different statement from the Senator's that the bridge had been abandoned.

Mr. POMEROY. I never said it.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the Senator to say that; and if that was not what he meant, it was wholly unimportant to state where Captain Eads was or where he was going.

The Senator from Kansas said in his speech to-day, and he said it the other day, and it has been repeated this evening, that five hundred feet span bridges are experiments; that they have never succeeded; that they are new things, and the Senator from Kansas went on to argue very learnedly, indeed, on the subject. I thought he certainly must be an engineer; he must have read divers old books on the subject of bridge building. He went on to prove this morning that an arch bridge with a five hundred feet span or a long span, made of iron and steel, would fail on account of expansion from heat. He said that it was a new thing which had never been done, and therefore we were advancing upon an untried experiment. That was a pretty "round assertion," but it was not made by myself; it comes from the other side, and I think they are somewhat badly off for facts and arguments when they indulge in statements of that character.

Now, I ask the attention of the Senate while I read the statement of Captain John A. Roebling, the engineer who built the bridge at Niagara, a railroad bridge of eight hundred and fifty-eight feet span. That bridge has been in operation thirteen years, and it is said that a train of cars can be run over that bridge at the rate of thirty miles an hour. They do not do it, for that would be madness over a fearful chasm like that; but that railroad bridge is perhaps the strongest in the world to-day. I have before me the statement of the engineer of that bridge, and the engineer of the Cincinnati bridge, which is ten hundred and fifty-eight feet span, and which, it is estimated, will bear a burden of fifteen thousand tons, and who is now building a bridge at the Highlands across the Hudson with a sixteen hundred feet span, a railroad bridge estimated to sustain a weight of twenty-five thousand tons when it is finished. He is now constructing that bridge, and has furnished plans, I believe, for a bridge of two thousand feet span over the East river at New York. This distinguished engineer, whose knowledge I take to be quite equal to that of the Senator from Kansas—I should certainly take his opinion as soon as the Senator's—makes a statement, to which I ask the attention of the Senate while I read it:

OFFICE OF JOHN A. ROEBLING.
TRENTON, NEW JERSEY, April 7, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: In your note of the 4th you request me to state some of the facts relating to the practicability of large span railroad bridges. The following railway bridges, all on leading lines and doing a heavy business, are constructed on different plans, and have all stood the test of time:

The Niagara bridge, in this country, with one clear span of eight hundred and twenty feet.

That is a suspension bridge.

The Steubenville bridge, over the Ohio, three hundred and twenty feet.

That is a truss bridge.

The Britannia bridge, in England, spans of four hundred and sixty feet.

That is the tubular bridge.

The Saltash bridge, over the Tamar, England, spans of four hundred and fifty-five feet.

That is a truss bridge.

The Rhine bridge, at Cullinburg, in Holland, spans of five hundred feet.

That is a truss and arch bridge in combination, and has been in use a number of years.

The Disnaw bridge, over the Weichsel, in Prussia, three hundred and ninety feet.

The Hogat bridge, in Prussia, three hundred and twenty feet.

The Rhine bridge, at Cologne, Prussia, three hundred and twenty feet.

The Rhine bridge, at Coblenz, Prussia, three hundred and twenty feet.

The Rhine bridge, at Mayence, Prussia, three hundred and thirty-two feet.

I might extend this list, but if this number is not sufficient to establish "practicability," no number and no argument will. When I recommended five hundred feet spans I was fully aware that bridge builders and railroad men generally would object, because the erection of large spans certainly involves a little more cost and also a little more skill. But by combining the suspension principle with the truss, as I have often recommended, a considerable saving will be effected. Spans of five hundred feet on this plan will not cost more than ordinary lattice or truss spans of three hundred and fifty feet.

For the Cincinnati and Newport bridge I would recommend a trussed suspension bridge, with a middle span of seven to eight hundred feet, and two half spans of three hundred and fifty to four hundred feet, as the best and also the cheapest in the end. The various stories circulated about the Niagara bridge are all nonsense. That bridge will admit of the highest practicable speed for passing trains, but it would be madness to permit it over that fearful chasm.

Truly yours,
THEODORE COOK, ESQ.

As I said to the Senator from West Virginia the other day, if he was only well informed he would find that he could build his bridge at five hundred feet span, thus saving one pier in the Ohio river, with less expense than his present span. I put this statement of Mr. Roebling, in regard to the existence of these wide-span bridges, against the round assertions of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from West Virginia that they are mere experiments and that the thing has never been done. The testimony is against the Senators.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the Senator tell me of one in the United States that is not a suspension bridge?

Mr. MORTON. Suppose there are none in the United States, does that make any difference? If these bridges can be built in England and Holland and Germany, can they not be built here? If they are built successfully anywhere, as they have been in numerous instances, the building of them is not an experiment.

But the Senator from Kansas went on to show to-day that you could not build a bridge with five hundred feet span. He said that if you did, as they were going to do at St. Louis, it would have a steel arch, and that the expansion of the steel by the heat would elevate the bridge in the center, and when a train got on it would break. I was told by the Senator from Ohio this evening that when the bill was before Congress some years ago to allow the Steubenville bridge to be built with a span of three hundred feet a learned Senator, quite as learned as the Senator from Kansas, Senator Collamer, of Vermont, a distinguished man, said that an individual who would invest his money in a bridge of three hundred feet span was a fool; that no such span could be made and stand. Mr. Collamer was a man of good sense, but his ideas were behind the times. Bridge building has made far greater advances since then than before. The Senator's argument that the heat will expand the steel, and, therefore, the bridge must break, is a good deal like the argument that was made when it was first proposed to build iron houses and iron bridges. A certain learned engineer who wrote himself down a quadruped in the Scientific American, published in New York, sent forth an argument that the expansion of the iron would be such as to break the front of the house or to break the bridge, and that no bridge or house could be constructed of iron on account of its expansion. We all know how sound the argument of that engineer was, and I must say that the argument of the Senator from Kansas is undoubtedly borrowed from that learned man's communication.

I was somewhat amused this afternoon by the argument of the Senator from Kansas that the navigation of all these rivers will cease. He says that in a few years there will be no steamboats; there will be no navigation upon any of these rivers; the railroads running by their sides will do all the business, and navigation will be abandoned. Why, Mr. President, that is information; that is news! I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether the Erie canal has been abandoned? With two or three railroads running across the State of New York, I ask if that canal is not doing more business than it has ever done before; if it was not enlarged some four or five years ago at an expense of several million dollars, and if it is not now proposed to enlarge the Erie canal again at an enormous expense? Why? Because the chief freights upon the canal are such that railroads cannot compete with it, and the freights upon the rivers are still cheaper than they are upon canals. Railroads can never compete with canals and canals can never compete with rivers in regard to some transportation. I read the affidavit the other day of a coal dealer in Pittsburgh to show that coal transported by rail to Cincinnati would cost twenty-one and a quarter cents a bushel and transported by the river a cent and a half a bushel; and yet we are told by the learned Senator from Kansas that the river navigation is about to be abandoned and steamboats will soon be a thing of the past!

Now, Mr. President, I want to submit a question or two to the Senators and to the Senate. I want to ask why it is that, with the exception of a small railroad interest, the universal wish of all the people in the Ohio river valley is that five hundred feet shall be the minimum span over the center of the river. I do not know of a newspaper from Pittsburgh to Cairo that is not in favor of the five hundred feet span. If there should happen to be a paper published at Parkersburg, as I presume there is, somewhere in the shadow of my friend's residence overlooking the Ohio river, it is possible that that newspaper may take his view of this question. I do not blame the Senator from West Virginia. He is the president of a little railroad company that has an old charter to construct a bridge across the Ohio river on a narrow span. My friend wants to get his bridge finished, and if it is to come down then it must come down at the public expense; and if a more costly one is to be built it will be built, perhaps, at the public expense. I do not, therefore, blame him for his interest in this question; it is but natural that he should take it.

But I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the universal feeling of the merchants, manufacturers, business men up and down that valley, is in favor of five hundred feet as the minimum span, and I say that Congress ought to pay some regard to their wishes. I have furnished the evidence here of some sixty of the oldest steamboat pilots on that river, the average experience of each man among them being twenty years, and their testimony is that nothing else than a five hundred feet span will be safe for navigation. I have presented the testimony of forty-two insurance companies at Cincinnati, and also the testimony of all the insurance companies at Pittsburgh, that putting these narrow spans on the river of only three hundred feet, for the one at Steubenville is three hundred and twenty, will increase the rate of insurance. I have presented the testimony of the coal-dealing interest at Pittsburgh, at Pomeroy, and at Wheeling. Why, sir, I have the testimony of sixty merchants of the principal town in the State where the Senator from West Virginia lives, Wheeling, urging that Congress shall not allow any less bridge to be built than five hundred feet span. I have the testimony here of some three or four hundred of the principal merchants of the city of Cincinnati, and nearly as many in the city of Pittsburgh, to the same effect. I have the names and testimony of several hundred steamboat men, steamboat captains, steamboat owners, business men of every description; and their testimony is uniform that a span of not less than five hundred feet over the center of the river is demanded by the interests of commerce.

And, sir, what is there on the other side? Where is the testimony on the other side? It is the testimony of the two Senators chiefly based upon their own statements, my friend from Kansas arguing upon his scientific knowledge that a five hundred feet span cannot be put up and sustained, and the other arguing from his observations upon the Ohio river from his look-out.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If the Senator pleases, I should like to remark that I brought the testimony of twenty-five civil engineers who met a few years ago.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I thought I disposed of that little piece of testimony the other day, and I did not suppose that anybody would have the confidence to refer to it again. The Senator did refer to the statement of some engineers, I do not know the number, but it turned out that they were in the interest of a man by the name of Boomer, in Chicago, a wealthy man who had organized a company to build a bridge across the Mississippi river at St. Louis, and he wanted to build it with a three hundred feet span, and he laid his plan before those engineers, and they gave him their opinion upon it. Captain Eads organized a company in the city of St. Louis to build a bridge there, and he proposed one span of five hundred feet and two others of four hundred and ninety-seven feet each. The result has been that Mr. Boomer has abandoned his plan and repudiated it, and joined Captain Eads's company to build a bridge with five hundred feet span. I supposed after that statement it was unnecessary again to refer to what was said by those engineers.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The gentleman may assume that their report was got up by Mr. Boomer, for aught I know, but Mr. Boomer's name is not in it or near it. I read from the report of this board of engineers to whom plans were submitted for building bridges. One plan was for one five hundred feet span, and another for two of three hundred and eighty-four feet, and they decided that the three hundred and eighty-four feet span was sufficient.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MORTON. I hope not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will give way for a vote, but if debate is to go on I think we had better go into executive session and transact the business we must do.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know of any particular reason for that, or anything to justify it. This bill has been pending for some time, and it is a very important bill. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate a minute unnecessarily. The Senate have an appreciation of the character of this bill, and I trust they will dispose of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. We have had a long debate about this bill every time it has been before the Senate. Whenever it is taken up we have the same old speeches over and over again. If we can have a vote I am willing to give way; but if we cannot have a vote I insist on my motion. The Senate can do as they choose.

Mr. SUMNER. I have great interest in the business in executive session; but I cannot forget that this evening was set apart for the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Indiana, and I am therefore disposed to proceed with its consideration so long as there is a reasonable chance.

Mr. MORTON. I have but a few more words to say. I simply wish to repeat, and it is a statement that cannot be contradicted, that when you go to the cities all along the line of this river from Cairo up to Pittsburgh, a distance of some twelve hundred miles, you find the feeling uniform. Steamboat men, flatboat men, merchants, pilots, men engaged in every kind of occupation, are denouncing narrow-span bridges, and the whole experience of the navigation of the river is upon one side of this question. There are two railroad companies that want to build narrow-span bridges, because they think they can build them a little cheaper. There is a bridge company at Cincinnati that is resisted by the whole population of that city except the men who have got the stock and want to build a narrow-span bridge. The people of that city are just as much interested in railroads as those of any city in the United States. There is no antagonism to railroads; but they are a unit in sentiment on this question. There should be no antagonism between the railroad interest and the navigating interest. Both can live and both can do well. But it is the universal sentiment of the people in the valley of the Ohio that the existence of these short span bridges will impair the navigation of the river, and that if they are increased in number they will finally destroy it. I am speaking for the inhabitants of the valley of the Ohio.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President—

Mr. ANTHONY. Is not my motion in order? I made a motion to go into executive session, and gave way to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. TIPTON. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ANTHONY. I made a motion which was not put.

Mr. TIPTON. I desire to say a very few words in regard to this question.

I understand, Mr. President, that unless it can be proved satisfactorily that the three hundred feet span bridge at Steubenville, Ohio, is an obstruction to the navigation of the river, there is no probability that Congress is likely to establish by law a requirement for a span of five hundred feet. The Senator from Indiana asks the question very emphatically if it is practicable to navigate the river with a bridge in the way with a span of three hundred feet. He asks why it is that men engaged in commerce upon the Ohio demand a span of five hundred feet. Now, I wish to call his attention to the fact that in this report the position is emphatically taken that where there might be one thousand feet or more in width in the channel, any pier would be an obstruction to navigation, though there was one thousand feet of space. The facts are these in regard to the navigation of that river; no interest is supposed to be paramount to the interest of the coal trade; and although no man pretends that a three hundred feet span has ever interfered with ordinary navigation, with legitimate business, by steamboats, the charge is that the transportation of coal by means of barges may be interfered with. But by this report the position is also made clear and distinct that if the location of the bridge at Steubenville had been scientifically made there would have been no trouble. I read the language of the report itself:

"Every defect"—

And I wish Senators especially to pay attention to this. This report says that—

"Every defect which this location has for navigation might have been avoided by a practicable location one and a half mile below."

There are four reasons assigned in this report why that bridge has never been condemned and why that bridge cannot be condemned. In the first place, there is no three hundred feet span about it that is practicable for navigation. By the rip-raps, or the obstructions that have been thrown around the base of the piers for the purpose of warding off the rafts, there are but two hundred and fifty feet left for the purposes of navigation. No shipping merchant of Pittsburgh, therefore, no man has ever yet had the privilege of running his rafts or of navigating there with a channel of three hundred feet. They have access to only two hundred and fifty feet, and you cannot therefore condemn a span of three hundred feet when the obstructions around the base of the piers are such as that they never did use and cannot use this day more than two hundred and fifty feet.

But there is more than that in the location of that bridge. That bridge with its three hundred feet span cannot be used as a three hundred feet span, because this report says it has been located in a bend of the river, and this report says that there is an additional drawback upon the use of three hundred feet under that bridge, and it is that before you approach it, about one mile and a half above, there is such a change in the current by virtue of a curve in the river that you have to reverse the machinery of your steamboat or your paddle wheels as you approach the bridge, and are not in condition when you reach it therefore to pass it with entire safety.

But this report further says that with all the difficulties, with all the drawbacks, with all that results from an improper and unscientific knowledge in the construction of that bridge, it is perfectly safe to pass it in the day, and that it is passed with safety.

It is further admitted in this report in regard to that bridge that if the location had been made in such a manner as that the piers should have been at right angles to the current of the river, the whole space might have been occupied which was clear; but the piers have been placed in such a manner that they do not stand at right angles to the current of the river, and on that account several feet of the space are entirely lost, and cannot be occupied.

I hold, therefore, that the bridge at Steubenville has never been condemned, and it never can be condemned until it stands upon a clear, straight, and unobstructed current with a span of three hundred feet. This report admits if it were put in such a position as that, navigation need not necessarily be impeded by the bridge. Its present location is unfortunate, and therefore there is no such thing as three hundred feet of span for the purposes of navigation, and you cannot condemn the idea of a bridge for that purpose with three hundred feet span until you change the location of that bridge, place it under other circumstances, and give it a scientific location; and that is the language of this report itself. I hold, so far as that is concerned, that the interests of commerce and the interests of travel from east to west by railroad are as great as the interests of the coal trade of the city of Pittsburgh and the shores of the Ohio. That is the only interest against it. The assumption is that with a front of barges which shall measure one hundred and fifty feet there necessarily ought to be a wider place; but there is no necessity whatever that one hundred and fifty feet should be established as the front of barges with the tow-boats in order to establish a rule upon this subject. That coal interest can be carried on, and successfully carried on.

The increase of insurance is another argument. We understand that perfectly well. Insurance companies necessarily will take advantage of whatever may be supposed to be an obstruction, and for every pier that shall be placed in the channel of the Ohio river they will thank God and take courage and put up their rates of insurance higher. It is a godsend to them that you give them a law which will enable them to have a justifiable pretext, as they will aver, for increasing the rates of insurance, and they will give you a scale of insurance that will go up for every pier that you place in the channel of the Ohio, not necessarily, but because they may have the opportunity under the action of the bill.

I do not pretend to understand this subject scientifically, but I do pretend to understand that you cannot condemn the bridging of the Ohio in that latitude from the fact that an insufficient bridge improperly located, that never gave three hundred feet at all, and never, under any circumstances, more than two hundred feet of space, has been built.

Mr. CAMERON. Mr. President, I hope we shall take the vote at once now, and that there will be no more speaking. The friends of the measure do not desire to speak at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not design to occupy any time this evening; but the Senator from Indiana seemed to have forgotten the subject, and discoursed at considerable length in regard to the capacity and qualifications of those who felt it to be proper in the discharge of their public duty to oppose this bill. When a man leaves his subject in order to discourse upon the knowledge and capacity of those who oppose him it only argues that the subject is weak, and that he thinks attention may be diverted from it to something else.

The Senator remarked that the tactics of those who opposed this bill had been peculiar. At first I did not understand that; but now I begin to see through it, and yet I do not understand precisely what tactics were alluded to. I am one of those who embraced every opportunity to investigate and understand this question and make as early a report as could be made. We heard what was presented to us as members of the committee, principally, however, from men engaged in the river traffic and trade, men who were in the habit of going up and down the river, and who regarded any kind of a bridge a great obstruction, and thought that no bridge was consistent with the public interest.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg the Senator from Kansas to allow me to make a motion to go into executive session. Have I his permission?

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator desires an executive session, very well. I am not in any hurry.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought the Senator was in favor of the passage of this bill, and on that account I did not suppose he would favor an executive session now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator from Kansas will allow me, I desire to make a suggestion. As this bill has been discussed at considerable length, and I confess for one that my own mind has been thrown in some doubt by the discussion of the question, as I am not an engineer, the suggestion I wish to make is that we amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

That the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall appoint a board of scientific engineers, to consist of not less than seven, who shall report to the next session of Congress the proper width of span in railroad bridges across the Ohio river adequate to the wants of navigation and commerce upon that river; and that until Congress shall by law take action upon said report no bridge shall be erected over said river.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator from Kansas gave way to my motion to go into executive session.

Mr. POMEROY. I yield the floor if the Senator from Pennsylvania desires.

Mr. CAMERON. I make that motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Senator will allow me, I will offer my amendment that it may be printed.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to the amendment. I rather think it is a good one.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am not engineer enough to determine this question. I should like to see the report of a board of engineers appointed by the Secretary of War, and in the meanwhile suspend building bridges. Then when we have the report we can act at the next session.

Mr. CAMERON. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The meeting this evening was expressly to consider this bill, and the Chair had some doubts as to whether the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania was in order. But as the whole matter is under the control of the Senate, the Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 16.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays, and desire to say just one word. My colleague has felt from the first a great deal of interest in this bill. His health does not permit him to remain constantly in the Senate without inconvenience. He has desired to leave and expected this bill to be disposed of to-night, and I think it is due to him to allow him that opportunity. He had not expected to remain until this hour of the session; but representing one of the States that is washed by the Ohio river he has felt it to be his duty to urge this measure upon the attention of the Senate. I take a great deal of interest in seeing this matter come to a vote to-night, on his account, though I have taken no leading part in it myself. I think, if the Senate will reflect a moment, they will allow this bill to come to a vote. If it is not the pleasure of the Senate to pass it, it can be rejected, and that will end it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I will say I voted for an executive session because I thought the honorable Senator himself [Mr. MORRIS] voted for it.

Mr. CONNESS. Oh, no.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, is this motion debatable?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not want to debate it, but I asked permission of the Senate to say that much of a personal sort.

Mr. ANTHONY. Although the motion is not debatable, I hope I may be allowed by general consent to say this: if the Senate is prepared to vote upon this bill, there is no difficulty in taking the vote; but if we are going to debate it for a longer time, I think there are other matters that demand the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am sure that if the Senator from Rhode Island wished to go home, and had charge of an important bill, we would all endeavor to gratify him by disposing of it.

Mr. CAMERON. I rise to make a proposition. It is that if Senators will agree to take the vote on this bill I will withdraw my motion for an executive session. What does the Senator from Kansas say to that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot understand a conditional motion. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania withdraw the motion he made?

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir; I withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. Is that the amendment I had the honor of suggesting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas to the amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads proposed to fill the blank in line ten of the first section by inserting two hundred and fifty, and the blank in the thirteenth line by inserting five hundred. The Senator from Kansas moves to amend the amendment by inserting two hundred and twenty in place of two hundred and fifty, and three hundred in place of five hundred; so as to make the clause read:

All the spans other than the one over the main low-water channel shall be at least two hundred and twenty feet in length in the clear, and the span covering the main low-water channel of the river shall be of such length as to leave at least three hundred feet of unobstructed passage way for navigation at all stages.

Mr. MORTON. That is the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, which I hope will be defeated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I had not yielded the floor except for a motion to go into executive session. I did not design to make any extended remarks. I was saying that it was a very convenient and interesting thing perhaps for a Senator who has completed what he has to say to have the vote taken before any reply can be made; but it is not the usage of the Senate, and I hope it will not be insisted upon at this moment.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator means to allude to me, I have said but very little on this subject. I was stopped this morning by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. I yielded the floor.

Mr. CAMERON. But I have given way because I did not wish to occupy the whole of the night just here at the close of the session on this measure; and I must beg the Senator's pardon for saying that all that has been said this evening has been very much repetition. It is very warm weather, and I think that we understand the subject just as well now as we shall after we hear a dozen more speeches upon it.

Mr. POMEROY. I propose to say what I choose to say on the subject.

Mr. CAMERON. Certainly the Senator will, and I shall not try to interrupt him unless he will be graceful enough to yield.

Mr. POMEROY. I yield the floor to the Senator if he desires to make any remarks.

Mr. CAMERON. No, sir.

Mr. POMEROY. I am not going to speak against time, nor to worry it out. I propose to reply in a few words as well as I can to the points made by the Senator from Indiana at the time that he referred to the tactics practiced by the members of the committee in opposing this bill, and the statements made by some members of the committee this morning. I will only add here that the statements made this morning, so far as relates to the character and capacity of bridges in this country, have not been disputed by the Senator from Indiana, and cannot be. It was said that there are no existing bridges of the character mentioned in this bill. The Senator insisted that that was a great mistake, a departure from the truth, and yet he failed to point out a single structure; and I challenge contradiction on that subject. This is an experiment. I said there was a suspension bridge at Niagara, but that is not in controversy. The bridges proposed by railroad companies are truss bridges or a combination of the truss bridge. I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. McAlpine, an engineer of such known capacity, integrity, and national reputation, that it will add nothing to him for me to speak of him, in which he says that his attention has been called to a letter in the Globe, read by the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS], in which one Mr. Eads states that—

"An arched bridge of one thousand feet span can be constructed at a cost not greatly in excess of three hundred and fifty feet trusses."

Mr. McAlpine replies to this by simply saying:

"No professional engineer will agree with this opinion."

Then he says further:

"Sixteen months since I listened to the discussion of this subject by the most eminent engineers of England, at the Institution of Civil Engineers in London. Upward of five hundred engineers were present, among them Messrs. Barlow, Hemans, Breton, Fowler, Iaco, Gregory, Vignoles, Hawkshaw, Bidda, Lane, Bromwell, and others, all of whom joined in the discussion. I have before me a printed copy of their remarks.

"A few advocated the suspension system; others contended that it was not applicable to railway purposes; and the general conclusion was that truss or tubular bridges should be used wherever practicable."

"In the present state of knowledge of the profession I doubt whether any engineer of standing and experience would willingly recommend such a plan as Mr. Eads has proposed."

"It would be a severe blow to the railway interest if Congress should prohibit spans of less than five hundred feet. Engineers would be unwilling to recommend and railway companies slow to adopt spans of such length."

I know of no one else but Colonel Eads who proposes the span contained in this bill. If the Senator from Wisconsin had examined this bill throughout he would have seen that it provides for a board of engineers; that the minimum length of three hundred feet is provided for and secured except as there may be an appeal taken to the Secretary of War, in which case he is authorized by the third section of this bill to have it examined by engineers of the engineer corps of the Army, and then, upon their recommendation, he is authorized to make a structure of any capacity, and a span of any width that they may determine to be essential or necessary for the public interests.

Now, Mr. President, there must somewhere be a compromise. The river interest should not be sacrificed, nor should the railroad interest. They must agree upon some plan of compromise. It would be better for the river if there were no bridges; it would be better for the railroads if there were no rivers; but the thing is impossible. We are to have both railroads and rivers, and there must be a compromise somewhere upon some equitable plan. It is proposed in this bill, with my amendment, that the minimum shall be three hundred feet span, and if a case can be made out where the public interest demands it, the Secretary of War may cause it to be made five hundred feet or one thousand feet. There is no limit in that direction; but it shall begin at three hundred feet.

Personally I feel the least interest in this bill of any Senator here. I do not know that I have a friend on earth that has a dime's interest in it; but I regard it as a great blow to the railroad enterprise of this country if, when they come to the Ohio river, they are obliged to stop. This is a bill against bridging the river. It is prohibitory. It is like a tariff that we sometimes put upon articles that prevents importations. By this bill, the minimum, the lowest point of span, is required to be five hundred feet from the mouth to the summit of that river, whether the river is three hundred feet wide or not. It is a death-blow to any enterprise that proposes to bridge the Ohio river. It is requiring what has never been done. It is requiring what the best engineers say is impracticable, not impossible, but impracticable, and not within the reach of expense of ordinary corporations. Will the Senate do it? You will probably incorporate a company from Virginia that will ascend the Alleghenies, that will go west toward the Pacific until it reaches the Ohio valley, and then it must stop. You propose by this legislation to put an obstruction there insurmountable within any ordinary expense. You cannot get an engineer of known national reputation and character who will recommend a bridge of this span. You may find some man who has made his money by building gunboats during the war, and obtained some notoriety in that way, who will recommend it. But convene any board of engineers in this country, and you cannot get a recommendation of a span of this character; and yet you propose in this bill to fix it in unalterable law that the minimum, the very smallest span over the main channel, shall be five hundred feet, a space not required in any river or upon any bridge in this country. In the cases that were read from abroad, although they were large in the extreme, one tubular bridge being over four hundred feet, yet none of them came up to five hundred.

Mr. MORTON. That is a misprint; four hundred and ninety-two feet is the length of the bridge.

Mr. POMEROY. Four hundred and ninety-two feet. I say not one of them in this country, or anywhere, save the suspension bridge of which I have spoken, has ever been made a success.

Now, I appeal to Senators not to defeat this bill, not to delay it even; but I appeal to them not to fasten in this bill a provision that shall be prohibitory, of such a character that no company can build a bridge. The progress of our commerce and trade and business is westward, and an obstruction through the length of the Ohio river would be a national calamity. It would be felt in every State of this Union. To fix in this law that no span shall be less than five hundred feet is ruinous. Not wishing to throw unnecessary obstructions in the way of the passage of this bill I have only stated the case, and so far as I am concerned I am ready to vote.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Kansas does not state the true question which is involved in this bill. His proposition is that the question that is presented in this bill is whether it be practicable to construct a railroad bridge of five hundred feet in span. That is an illusive presentation of the question. The question is will a bridge of a less span than five hundred feet present a serious obstruction to the navigation of the Ohio river? I understand this proposition to be true, that no bridge of a less span than five hundred feet, or of that span either, ought to be constructed across the Ohio river if it seriously obstructs the navigation of that stream. The extent of that river from Pittsburg to its mouth is nearly eleven hundred miles. The navigation of the Allegheny extends some two hundred miles in addition, and up the Monongahela about the same distance, two hundred miles. Here are fifteen hundred miles of river navigation, the greatest extent of river navigation in a connected line on the continent except the upper and lower Mississippi combined.

Now, Mr. President, here is a great natural highway of commerce that has been used from the first settlement of the country. The capacities of that river and of its navigation are well and best known to one particular class of men, and that class of men are the river navigators themselves. I should prefer their judgment and their conclusions in relation to what sort of a bridge would be or would not be a serious obstruction to the navigation of that stream to those of all the Secretaries of War, and all the engineers, and all the scientific men that live upon the face of the earth. The judgment of those men, many of whom have been navigating that stream for forty and fifty years, who are as familiar with it in the night-time as the day, and who of a moonless and perfectly cloudy night can run the channel of that river with as much certainty as men can now by the aid of all the gas-lights in this Capitol tread its mazes, their judgment in relation to what bridges form obstructions to that stream is entitled to the very highest credit and consideration from the Senate.

There are at least one hundred million bushels of coal that are floated upon the bosom of the river, either from its principal tributaries, the Allegheny and the Monongahela, or from the river below the confluence of those two streams. They pass for six or seven hundred miles along the shores of the State of Kentucky, and they then enter the Mississippi. These coal-boats, barges, &c., deposit their freights all along down to the emporium of the valley of the Mississippi, the city of New Orleans itself. There are forty million bushels of coal that are transported down that river from Pittsburg, and from Pomeroy and the points where coal is loaded below Pittsburg; there are at least sixty millions more bushels, making an aggregate of one hundred million bushels of coal. There is not a bushel of coal that is freighted down the Mississippi river, I suppose, but what floats into it upon the bosom of the Ohio.

What is the cost of this transportation by river, and what would be its cost by rail? The actual cost of two hundred thousand bushels of coal by the river was $3,000. The actual cost of the same quantity by rail was $42,500. The increase of the cost of transportation by rail over the cost of transportation by river is about fourteenfold. The one hundred million bushels of coal which, if transported by the river, would amount to $1,500,000 of freight, if it was transported by rail would amount to $21,253,000. Such, sir, is the extent of tonnage of a single article of merchandise upon that river, and such the relative cost of that merchandise when transported by rail or by river.

Can a wise legislative assembly, deliberating and passing laws upon the subject of the commerce of this river, in contrast with the commerce of railroads, in view of these striking facts, hesitate for one moment in deciding the proposition whether they will allow a bridge to seriously obstruct the navigation of that river or not? I should suppose not. If the navigation of the river must cease, or the construction of railroad bridges across it must stop, the interests of the country and of all the commerce and business in the valley, not only of the Ohio but of the Mississippi river also, require that bridges shall no longer be constructed across that stream to the serious impediment of its navigation. When the alternative is offered to Congress, shall this river be seriously obstructed in its navigation, or shall there be a break and a suspension in railroads at the river, can any reasonable man hesitate to accept the last proposition?

Sir, I should be willing myself to construct bridges that would slightly impede the navigation of the river, but not materially. I should like myself that there should be no breaks in the line of railroads at the banks of the Ohio. I should like the iron car to leap across the streams and roll on in its progress and speed to its final destination; but if that cannot be effected without breaking up the navigation of the river the iron horse must stop there; he must halt on the eastern side; and another iron horse must take up his onward career on the western side.

Mr. President, I understand very little about the navigation of the Ohio river. I have been up and down it upon steamboats very frequently. I know this, and every man who knows anything of the flow of water and the laws which regulate the flow of water knows, that when abutments are set up in the middle of a river or other stream the necessary result is to create eddies and counter-currents at the abutment. That is inevitable. The business that is done upon this stream is done in the high tide of the river. At that time the current sweeps with most rapidity and strength. As it flows it strikes with more force upon the resisting abutment, and consequently the eddy and the cross-current that are hereby produced are increased in proportion to the height of the stream. To tell me that coal barges, that spread in width before a tug that impels them from two hundred and forty to two hundred and sixty feet, some of them, in a high tide of the water, can run safely under an arch of three hundred feet without imminent danger of striking into eddies and currents that would float them against the pier and wreck the boats or seriously impede their progress is to tell me that which I cannot believe.

Why, sir, I hold in my hand the report of one house trading in coal down the Ohio river, showing that in one year their losses from detentions alone, independent of the loss of boats and the sinking of coal, amounted to $8,000.

Mr. MORTON. At a single bridge?

Mr. DAVIS. At a single bridge, the Steubenville bridge. That house did not transport one twentieth part of the coal that floats down that river. This was only one item of injury, that which resulted from detention; and the report states that the boats and property of this company were injured by being precipitated against the piers to the extent of some considerable additional injury.

Well, sir, these evils are not to be restricted to their present number. The lines of railroad are striking the Ohio river on its different shores at many other points. In the course of twenty or thirty years there must be at least fifty of these bridges constructed between Pittsburg and the mouth of the Ohio. What a vast and injurious obstruction would be fifty bridges of three hundred feet span across that stream to its navigation, to its commercial interests, to it as a great natural highway, and the cheapest for all large and bulky articles, much cheaper than any artificial navigation or means of transportation that can be devised. It is time for the thing to cease. The Steubenville bridge ought to be abated to-morrow as a nuisance, and if there is a proper proceeding against it as a nuisance to the navigation of that stream in the United States courts, its abatement can be effected. It ought to be effected, and the construction of bridges that are so serious an obstruction to the free, safe, and commodious navigation of that stream ought to stop now. It is the interest of the railroad companies as well as the men who navigate the river that this thing should now stop.

Gentlemen need not tell me that pilots and steamboat men and the men interested in the navigation of the river are hostile to railroads. The contrary is the truth, so far as I am acquainted with the subject. In proportion as railroads intersect a stream they bring business to the river for transportation by steamboat and barges and other craft upon it. The navigators of the river, the pilots, those interested in the lines of steamboats, are interested not to the prejudice of railroads, but in favor of promoting railroads and of building railroad bridges to any extent that does not amount to a detriment to the navigation of the river.

Mr. President, at this late hour of the night I rose merely to give my few words upon this subject. I have expressed them as the subject strikes my mind. It seems to me that it would be a wanton and ungracious and ungrateful disregard of the bounty of Providence in giving this noble and beautiful river as a great highway of trade and navigation between the distant northeastern and southwestern portions of the United States to permit it to be unnecessarily obstructed by the construction of railroad bridges. If railroad bridges cannot be thrown by a practicable span across that stream so as to admit of safe transportation along the railroad across the bridge over the stream, that mode of transportation must have a break there, and must be resumed on the opposite side.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to take the sense of the Senate on the amendment which I have sent to the Chair, because that is an amendment which provides for the appointment of a board of scientific engineers by the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, to report at the next session of Congress on this very point, the very disputed question as to what the width of these spans should be. I confess, after listening to the able gentlemen on both sides, my own mind as yet remains in doubt; and I presume what is true of myself may be true of other gentlemen around me. I am not a scientific engineer, nor have I studied bridges very much; nor have we had time since this discussion commenced to go into the examination of it for ourselves. If the amendment which I have suggested be adopted it can only work a delay until the next session of Congress in the building of any proposed bridges. It suspends all building of bridges until that report comes in. When that report comes in of these scientific men, seven in number, we shall then have information on which we can act.

It is said on one side, with great earnestness, that a railroad bridge with a span of five hundred feet would be a dangerous superstructure, and might involve the loss of trains and the loss of thousands of lives. On the other side it is said that railroad bridges of five hundred feet span are built; that there is over the Rhine one of four hundred and ninety-two feet, and that we can build them in this country as well as they can over the Rhine. I desire to hear from scientific engineers whose attention has been brought to this subject by the authority of Congress, for it is certainly one of the most important questions that can come before Congress as to what kind of bridges shall be allowed over the Ohio river. If it were not for the navigation in these coal barges, if all the navigation on that river was simply by steamboats, you could get along with a bridge of three hundred feet span; I see that very well; but when you consider that these coal barges run, it is said, two hundred and fifty feet in width, there may be difficulty in passing through a bridge of three hundred feet span. It is a question of maximum and minimum; it is a question for scientific investigation; and if the Senate are willing to adopt the amendment I suggest we can get this information at the next session of Congress.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator will allow me to say that I am very much in favor of his proposition to have this problem tested, but I desire to bring it to the test of experience, which tests science itself. I want the bridges, so far as they can be constructed with a proper regard to the safety and facility of that navigation, to be so constructed. I think the project of a bridge with a span of five hundred feet at St. Louis across the Mississippi river will probably be in such a state of forwardness in twelve months from this time as to test the question; and with a view to have it tested in that way I like the proposition of the Senator.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I had intended to speak on this question at some length, but I gave up the idea long since. I did not wish to weary the Senate with any remarks which I might have to make, when there was such a strong disposition to come to a vote on the subject. I would not occupy even a moment now if I had any assurance that the time would not be occupied by others and we should not have to adjourn with this question on our hands; but as I feel peculiarly situated and related to this subject, representing a State which is interested not only in the navigation of the western rivers, but largely interested in railroad enterprises, I consider it my duty at least to refer to the importance of the question.

I will say, first, as to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, that if he had examined this subject, he would want no further reports, no further surveys, and would not delay the construction of these railroad bridges until these reports can be made. The Senator from Indiana has amply demonstrated by reports of competent engineers, and by the best explorers, the river pilots, for they understand more about the river than engineers, that the whole western country is in danger of having its river navigation destroyed by the construction of railroad bridges. I live in a State which is washed on the west throughout its entire length by the Mississippi, and on the southwest by the Ohio, and it is intersected by the Illinois river; so that I feel deeply interested in river navigation. It is also intersected by railroads in every direction, north and south, east and west.

But the importance of this question is presented in this aspect: railroads are now becoming so numerous that they cross through every county almost, north and west, and we are to have, within thirty and forty miles of each other, railroad bridges crossing the Mississippi, and for a distance of four hundred miles up and down the length of the Illinois river. We know that the bridges which have been constructed are a continual source of obstruction to navigation. We know that on dark nights there is the utmost danger; that steamboats must stop and lay by; that coal boats are destroyed; that lumber boats are torn to pieces. Look at the Rock Island bridge, of which so much was said the other day. Look at the Peoria bridge, across the Illinois river, and others to which I might refer. And here, sir, in the West, with the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Ohio, and their tributaries embracing a water navigation of twenty thousand miles, shall we not hesitate before deciding upon a policy which will obstruct the navigation of those rivers?

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. YATES. Certainly.

Mr. NYE. What is the average width of the channel of the Mississippi from its source to below Cairo in ordinary water?

Mr. YATES. I cannot answer that question; I do not know. I suppose the average—

Mr. NYE. I am speaking of ordinary water.

Mr. YATES. Low water?

Mr. NYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. YATES. I do not know.

Mr. NYE. It is not the half of three hundred feet on an average.

Mr. YATES. That does not answer the point I am making.

Mr. NYE. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask you other question?

Mr. YATES. Yes, sir.

Mr. NYE. What is the object of a span bridge wider than the ordinary channel of the river? If you can run in ordinary water in a three hundred feet span, you certainly can run it in high water.

Mr. YATES. I will answer the Senator by saying that I am for some maximum and some minimum by which these bridges may be constructed without interfering materially with the navigation of the river; but I will say to the Senator that every bridge having a pier planted in a river is more or less of an obstruction. In stormy weather, in times of high floods, on dark nights, where there is unskillful navigation, and under many other circumstances, every pier in the channel of a river is more or less of an obstruction.

Now, sir; how long will it be if we leave this matter indefinite, if we leave it to the Secretary of War and to experienced and skillful engineers to say what the span of bridges shall be, before it can be properly settled? Can you trust any such reports? I care not how competent your engineers, how much of skill and standing they may possess, there are capital and power and too often corruption enough to get a bridge constructed of whatever size and whatever span they choose. The consequence will be that if there is not some maximum and some minimum fixed by law these rivers must inevitably be obstructed to the great damage of the commerce and the ruin of the country.

Mr. President, this is an interest in which all are concerned. I certainly am as much or more interested in railroad enterprises than in the navigation of our rivers. But it is for the interest of all, it is for the interest of railroad enterprises, that the bridges shall be composed of the longest span, the stoutest, the most durable. I do not suppose it is of particular benefit to the present corporators, to the men who are constructing these bridges, but for the railroad enterprises generally it is better that these bridges should be durable, and if the spans are long they must be durable. But, sir, as I desire a vote on this question, I shall make no further remarks upon it.

Mr. NYE. I think the honorable Senator from Illinois is right when he says that some proper rule for gauge of span should be adopted; but when I suggest to the honorable Senator, from all I have heard in this case, that I am at a loss to determine what that is, I presume I shall not awake his surprise. It is a subject upon which the best engineers are to-day at loggerheads; and I do not believe that the true science of that subject has been reached.

In my early life I had the honor to serve as sub-engineer under Mr. McAlpine, who is now acknowledgedly at the head of his profession in the United States. I have in my desk at home a private letter from him, in which I place great confidence, saying that the scheme of this bill is entirely impracticable. Whether it is or not I do not know; but there are two or three things to be considered in this question which seem to me to indicate the true policy to be delay in establishing the span of these bridges across the rivers. I undertake to say that from the source of the Mississippi river, where it is navigable to St. Louis, the average width of the channel is not two thirds of three hundred feet in ordinary water.

Mr. YATES. That is in low water. That does not apply to the case of high water.

Mr. NYE. Bridges are not to be built entirely for high water, but they are to be built in regard to the channels of the streams they cross; and when I suggest from a little experience to the honorable Senator from Illinois that much more depends on the manner in which a bridge is set across the current of the river than on the width of its span I apprehend he will agree with me.

Sir, while I would by no means obstruct the navigation of these mighty rivers of the West, I would be just as careful to protect this cross-navigation or cross-commerce that finds it necessary to cross those mighty streams to reach its original market and destination. While I would be careful not to obstruct the channel of the river, I would be just as careful not to impose obligations upon these corporations whose commerce runs in a different channel, upon the land, on railroads. It is a well known fact, and the honorable Senator from Indiana and the honorable Senator from Illinois, who are most interested in this, will agree with me when I say that the natural market for all their products is not down the Mississippi river, it is across it to the waves of the Atlantic, where they find their market.

I suggest to both honorable Senators that this body is not at this moment possessed of enough scientific knowledge to determine by law what these spans shall be; and I agree with the honorable Senator from Wisconsin when he says that he thinks a board of the wisest engineers should consider the question and report at the next session of Congress. I understand it to be the fact—I do not know that it is so—that under the existing law structures have been already commenced and great outlays made. If that be true, I think the Senate should be careful how they interfere with the rights of such parties, and should at least leave them in abeyance till means are taken to determine what the true span is.

I remarked that I placed great confidence in the opinion of Mr. McAlpine. His name—and when I say that I say nothing but the truth—is coupled with all the great enterprises of the State of New York, and his name is literally inscribed upon all of the more important works of that great State. He writes me that a span of five hundred feet is impracticable. I learned in my youth that he was accurate in his science and estimates. I believe him to be so still. Admonished, therefore, by his experience, I submit as a question of great propriety that before we, with this little examination—and for one I can say with so little ability to investigate and determine this question—undertake to increase the span of bridges, we should leave it for science to determine it, to be reported within four or five months to the next session of Congress for final decision.

Now, sir, I know not what companies are engaged in the works already commenced under the former law, but whatever they may be I suggest that in deference to their opinion, in deference to the law that a former Congress has passed, in deference to the investments they have made, we should not rush on ignorantly; at least, to say that the structures they have constructed or commenced shall be demolished, and that new ones, based upon less knowledge than theirs has been, shall be commenced.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. From what attention I have given to this subject I have no doubt the truth in this case, as it often does, lies in the mean—the middle—and that the best distance as a minimum on that river is four hundred feet. It is all idle to talk about railroad travel and freightage superseding the use for transportation of the Ohio river. That is true in some places, but it never will be true of the Ohio river. You might as well talk of railroads superseding the Atlantic or the Pacific as superseding the freightage of the Ohio or Mississippi rivers.

There is, then, one fact which has not been stated in this debate. I suppose that a bridge with a span of five hundred feet would cost as much again as one with a span of four hundred feet, because the whole structure has to be made in such vastly increased proportion in order to give strength to a span of five hundred feet.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. There seems to be some division of sentiment in the Senate, and as I have entire confidence in the report of a board of engineers to be appointed by the Secretary of War, I am willing to accept the proposition made by the Senator from Wisconsin that the Secretary of War shall appoint a board of competent engineers to examine this river and determine the width of span required for the purpose of securing navigation, and that, in the meantime, the construction of bridges shall cease until that is done. I have that much confidence in it that I am willing to take that course.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would suggest that the Senator from Wisconsin modify his amendment by adding this idea: that that board of engineers shall have regard to the location of the bridge and to the expense of the structure, because it is perfectly apparent that where the river is straight a span of three hundred feet would be all that was necessary; and if the bridge was placed where there was a crook in the river it might require a span of five or six hundred feet.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suggest in reply to the Senator from New Jersey that the bill now presented to the Senate and before them for consideration, in all these particulars is a very perfect bill, prepared under the supervision of the engineer department of the Army.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This is a matter not in the bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. All you want to determine now is the width of the spans. Although there was much information before the committee that justified us in saying that the spans might be five hundred feet long, and could be constructed economically, still we did not feel justified from the evidence before us in saying so absolutely until we were pressed to name some decisive span, and we then placed it at five hundred feet, leaving it, however, to the better judgment of the Senate to correct that if they thought otherwise. But if this matter is to come back to us, the bill had better be preserved. It is as perfect as it can be made to adapt the requirements of bridge building to the requirements of navigation. If the Senate agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that this matter had better go to the Secretary of War for further information, I suggest to him to postpone the bill until the next session, and in the mean time call for this information.

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is entirely satisfactory to me. I only want the thing settled scientifically. I have no objection at all, as far as I am concerned, to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. I will risk any board of engineers that have any national reputation. If it is the wish of the Senate to take a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, I will withdraw my amendment. I will do anything to get a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment withdrawn?

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Wisconsin will offer his amendment, I will withdraw mine. I only want to get a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment being withdrawn, the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall appoint a board of scientific engineers, to consist of not less than five, nor more than seven, who shall report to the next session of Congress the proper width of spans in railroad bridges across the Ohio river adapted to the wants of navigation and commerce upon that river; and that until Congress shall by law take action upon said report, no bridge shall be erected over said river.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to amend the substitute by adding:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to bridges already in process of construction.

If the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is adopted as it stands, it suspends the work on these bridges for at least a year; because we have to take advantage of the low water of this season of the year in order to do anything in the water; otherwise I should have no objection to it. But it strikes me that if the amendment of the Senator from Kansas prevails, fixing the minimum at three hundred feet, the bill already providing that the Secretary of War may convene a board of engineers to see whether that is sufficient to meet the necessities of navigation, you have the whole benefit of this amendment already in the bill by fixing the minimum instead of what will prove the maximum measure of span.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must object to the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. My people are very largely interested in the navigation of the Ohio river, and also in bridging. I have sat silent here because my mind has been in some doubt as to what ought to be done in regard to this matter. But whatever rule is adopted must apply to all bridges. There are two now being constructed, one at Bellaire and one at Parkersburg.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How far have they progressed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Only the materials are collected together.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. More than that.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have not put in the piers.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. They have not put in the piers, but they have laid the foundations for the shore piers twenty or thirty feet deep.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I ask is that whatever rule is adopted shall apply to all the bridges on the Ohio river. I have no objection then to a span of four or five hundred feet. I simply object to the amendment now proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the vote is taken I will state that I had a good deal to do with a bill that passed Congress a year or two ago on the subject of bridging the Mississippi river, and I took occasion then to examine this subject thoroughly. Since that time a board of the most competent engineers has met at St. Louis in reference to the St. Louis bridge, and they have come to the conclusion that unquestionably a bridge can be built with a span of five hundred feet. One of the most competent and able engineers in this country, in my opinion—I mean Mr. Eads, of St. Louis, the gentleman who built the gunboats upon the Mississippi river—has invested a very large amount of his own private fortune, and other competent engineers have also invested money in the construction of a bridge at St. Louis with a span of five hundred feet, to be, I think, ninety feet above low-water mark.

I am satisfied that nothing will be accomplished by selecting a board of engineers under the direction of the War Department, and sending them out to the Ohio river to ascertain what sort of bridges should be constructed. The engineers will differ among themselves as they have heretofore differed. I remember perfectly well, because I was then a member of the Post Office Committee, when the Steubenville bridge was authorized, and Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, was chairman of the committee, and the requisition was put upon that bridge company that they should build it with a span of three hundred feet, that Mr. Collamer after taking the testimony came to the conclusion that it was utterly impossible to build a bridge of that span that would carry safely a freight train of cars over it, and so asserted in the Senate according to my recollection. When objection was made to the bridge, he said it was nonsense to make the objection; let it pass through, because from all the testimony taken it was utterly impossible to construct that bridge. However, in the course of less than twelve months after the passage of that bill, the Steubenville bridge was constructed with a span of three hundred and twenty feet.

In my judgment there is no difficulty about bridging the Ohio river at any point with a span of five hundred feet. At almost any point where it is proposed now to bridge the Ohio river, take for instance at Bellaire, the banks on each side are very high. Take it also at Parkersburg. If I remember aright the same is the case there, and at almost every point where it is proposed to bridge this stream. It is not so on the Mississippi river. There on one side the approach is always low. A bluff bank can be found on one side of the Mississippi river, but invariably on the other, except at the rapids, the land is low and continues so for six or seven miles up.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I wish to correct the Senator. We shall have as much or more bridge on the land than we have on the water. We have to go very far back now to the hill so as to take the rise of the bridge. The bridge by law must be ninety feet above low water and fifty feet above high water. The whole elevation of the bridge is ninety feet at low water, and we have to go away back on both shores to get to the hills and build a bridge there. The foundations for the piers on the shore are all laid.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not speaking of that. The Senator will understand that according to my proposition he will be enabled to go on with his bridge. I do not understand him as taking the ground that it is utterly impossible to construct a bridge over the Ohio river with a span of five hundred feet.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Without an expense that no ordinary company can stand.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is a sad mistake. There is no question about the feasibility of the construction of bridges of this character, and especially anywhere on the Ohio.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I never denied that it was possible.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see no use of sending this matter to a board of engineers. Let us pass the bill in its present shape, and if the companies decide to go on with their bridges during the present summer and fall let them proceed; and let them proceed during the winter as they can at any point on the Ohio river. In fact, it is the best season for building bridges anyhow, because then the water is low. I see no necessity whatever of delaying the construction of bridges over the Ohio river in order that engineers may dispute over the proposition and make just such a report as has been read by the Senator from Indiana this evening. Some will say that it is feasible, others will say that it is not; and we shall be in as much doubt and hesitancy about the construction of these bridges after the reception of the report as we now are. Therefore, let the bill be passed as it is, and if the companies are willing to undertake the construction of bridges with a span of five hundred feet let them do so.

Mr. WILLEY. I have been trying to get the ear of the Chair for some time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment to an amendment is pending.

Mr. WILLEY. I was going to inquire if an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin was in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment is in order to the original bill. A substitute is now offered, and an amendment to that substitute is offered by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. VAN WINKLE,] which will be read, as it is doubtful whether the Senate understand it.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, which was to add the following proviso:

Provided, That this act shall not apply to bridges already in progress of construction.

Mr. VICKERS. I desire to say a word before the vote is taken on that amendment. I hold in my hand a letter from the president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company to whom I had written on this subject to know the condition of the bridges now in progress, and I will read the portion of his letter relating to that subject:

"There is no subject before Congress in which the State of Maryland and the States through whose territory our railway and its connections pass than the bill requiring a change in the length of span upon bridges over the Ohio river. The Baltimore and Ohio Company has already expended upward of four hundred thousand dollars upon the bridges being constructed under the existing act of Congress, to connect the Parkersburg branch with the Marietta and Cincinnati and the main stem of the Baltimore and Ohio road with the Central Ohio road at Parkersburg and Bellaire, respectively. The experience of the bridge at Steubenville, built by the Pennsylvania Railway Company, proves that the three hundred feet span does not affect navigation injuriously—no accidents having occurred except those which arose from the carelessness of boatmen. Three hundred feet is as great a span, many of our best engineers affirm, as can be safely used for the great weights which will pass upon the bridges in the exchanges of the commerce of the great West.

"The western States are deeply interested in these enterprises, as the comparative economy of the use of these structures will equal three cents per one hundred pounds in transportation—thus adding that sum to the value of the provisions and cereals of the farmers of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and other western States. Let legislation, as to the future and other sections be what it may, clearly, when such expenditures have been made in good faith under the existing act of Congress, no change should be made in the law affecting these bridges.

"Should the change be made in the length of the spans, as required by the resolution of the House, namely, to require five hundred feet for the length of the channel span, the Baltimore and Ohio Company will be compelled to abandon the construction of both bridges for the present, and it may be years before experience elsewhere, especially in view of the great additional cost involved, will justify the works to be again undertaken. The serious losses of such a delay to the great agricultural and other interests of the West, as well as to the commerce of Baltimore, are palpable."

Mr. President, Congress passed a law in 1862 authorizing this river to be bridged by railroad companies, and providing that the minimum span should be three hundred feet. Under this existing law the companies have expended upward of four hundred thousand dollars in the construction of these bridges, which are now in process of erection. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to prevent them from being completed; in other words, it provides that a board of engineers shall be appointed, and if they shall report in favor of a span of five hundred feet then these bridges shall be made to conform. These companies relied upon the faith of the Government. This act of Congress is just as binding in good faith upon the Government of this country as if it had made a special contract with these companies. I can see no difference in morals between an authority given by Congress to construct bridges of certain dimensions and a contract to build bridges of the same dimensions. An incorporation is in law a contract. If Congress charters a company that charter operates as a contract, and it cannot be modified or repealed unless the power be reserved in the charter. This law is in the nature of a contract, although not so in form, between the Government and the railroad companies. Congress held out to them an inducement to build these bridges, and believing that it did not intend to change the law, and acting in good faith, they have undertaken to construct these bridges according to the provisions of the law.

Now, I ask, is it competent for Congress, when a work is half completed, to say, you shall not finish it, and all you have done shall be lost? Would it not give to these companies an equitable claim upon Congress for the injury they may have sustained, whatever that injury might be? If they shall sustain injury by this bill which it is now proposed to pass (and if they shall ultimately be prevented from constructing these bridges with a three hundred feet span, they will be materially injured) they will have a just and equitable claim upon Congress to the extent of their loss.

I take it for granted that when the act of 1862 was passed Congress had full information before it upon that subject. I assume that Congress would never have passed the act of 1862 authorizing these bridges to be built with the three hundred feet span unless they had full and ample information upon the subject to justify them in making the enactment. Having made it, and induced parties to expend their money largely in this enterprise, is Congress now to be called on so to modify this law as materially to injure those whom it has thus induced to engage in the great work? Congress would have just as much right, when three fourths or four fifths of a bridge had been completed, to say that it shall not be completed, and that the span shall be five hundred feet, as they now have to say that they shall not prosecute this work, although they have expended $400,000 upon it, and are ready for immediate progress. I say, therefore, that it would be unjust and inequitable in Congress to pass such a law as this without the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

I hold in my hand a report made in August, 1867, less than twelve months ago, from twenty-eight of the most distinguished engineers in this country, and who, after a full examination, report that they cannot recommend a span of more than three hundred feet, and they assign their reasons for it. They also state that a span of five hundred feet would cost a much larger sum than one of three hundred feet. Let me read what they say on the subject:

"It was proved in joint committee that the cost of a span of five hundred and twenty feet (five hundred feet in the clear) will be more than twice as great per foot of bridge as a span of three hundred and sixty-eight feet (three hundred and fifty feet in the clear) and not less than three times as great as a span of three hundred and four feet; consequently, the cost of one span of five hundred and twenty feet will be equal to two spans of three hundred and sixty-eight feet, and one and a half spans of two hundred and sixty-four feet; that is, for the cost of one span of five hundred and twenty feet, no less than eleven hundred and fifty feet of bridge in spans of three hundred and sixty-eight feet and two hundred and sixty-four feet may be built."

The committee give the results of elaborate estimates of the weight of the bridge and the loads it will have to sustain, and of the consequent strains that will come on its several parts. They also give the spans of the various bridges in this country, as follows:

	Feet.
Longest span, Brazos river, Texas.....	250
Longest span, Big Black, Mississippi.....	162
Longest span, Tennessee river, Tennessee.....	196
Longest span, Cumberland river, Tennessee.....	209
Longest span, Duck river, Tennessee.....	200
Spans of bridges over the Penobscot river.....	209
Spans of Connecticut river bridges.....	200
Spans of Hudson river bridge.....	200
Much ice, many rafts, and large steamers.
Spans of the Schuylkill, Philadelphia.....	196
Spans of the Susquehanna.....	250
Spans of the Mississippi at Quincy.....	250
Spans of the Missouri at Kansas City.....	250
Spans of the Missouri at St. Charles, (being commenced).....	325
Spans of the Monongahela at Pittsburg.....	150
Spans of the Alleghany at Pittsburg.....	150
Spans of the Kentucky, near mouth.....	200
Spans of the Kentucky at Frankfort.....	160
Long spans of the Ohio river, at Louisville, at low water.....	350

"At the Victoria bridge (nearly two miles in length) the largest span is three hundred and thirty feet at the bridge level, and less at low-water level."

Now, sir, these are the bridges of this country, and the span of scarcely any of them comes up to the span provided for in the act of Congress of 1862.

I find also in this report a letter from McNairy, Claffen & Co., engineers, in which they state:

"We consider bridges constructed in span greatly exceeding three hundred feet as experimental, and presenting engineering and mechanical difficulties almost insurmountable without sacrificing the strength of the structure, while spans of five hundred feet, although one at the present time is projected in this country, we deem decidedly impracticable, and we believe it is so considered by the best engineers in the country, not only on account of the immense cost, but also of the difficulty of procuring material of suitable character to resist the strains in such a structure."

There are other letters here to the same effect.

Now, I submit it to the justice of the Senate whether it is proper at this particular juncture to restrain these parties who have expended their money from prosecuting the work on these bridges? Why, sir, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company have already built one steamer, running to Liverpool, and two large steamers, costing $700,000 each in gold, running to Bremen every month, and the freights and emigration have so increased that they are now building two other large steamers of equal size to ply between this country and Bremen, touching at Southampton in England. Their business is increasing to a great extent, and they will need these bridges across the Ohio as soon as they can possibly be constructed, to enable them to send the immigrants and the freight brought from Europe to the far West. I submit, therefore, to the judgment of the Senate whether these bridges ought not to be excepted from the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected; ayes seven, noes not counted.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the proposed substitute:

And the said board of engineers shall also examine the bridge across the Ohio river at Steubenville, and report whether it is any obstruction to the navigation of said river, and if so to what extent, and what should be done to remedy such obstruction.

Mr. POMEROY. I think that a very important amendment. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have an amendment to propose, to which I suppose there will be no objection whatever. It is to add:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to the bridge now in process of construction at Louisville.

That is being constructed with a four hundred feet span, and there is no question about it. No engineer has objected to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope whatever rule may be adopted will be general. The same trouble occurs there. All that my constituents want is one uniform rule, applicable to Louisville, Cincinnati, Bellaire, and everywhere else. I object to the amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What is the span?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not suppose the Senator from Ohio would make that broad statement. The facts in connection with the channel at the falls of the Ohio are entirely different from the facts at any other point of the river. A bridge is now being built of four hundred feet span, when the law required but three hundred, and it is far advanced in its construction, and is to be finished this fall. It is above the falls, and the Senator knows that the main business there is through the canal. The objection which has been urged at Steubenville and elsewhere is because barges are attached to steamboats. No such combination of boats can pass through the canal. The boat will have to be stripped of the barges. There is not the least objection to this amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think that bridge is very far advanced.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is nearly completed.

Mr. RAMSEY. It would not do to interfere with that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And the company has gone one hundred feet beyond what the law required.

Mr. RAMSEY. I have always understood from the friends of this proposition that the five hundred feet span people consented not to interfere with the bridge at Louisville.

Mr. POMEROY. This amendment does not interfere with it. It only requires a report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My amendment is in accordance with the committee's report.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Four hundred feet span is enough for any bridge. That is the truth about it.

Mr. MORTON. I will say a word on this subject. I think I understand it. The chute on the Indiana side of the falls is four hundred feet in width between the rocks, as I understand it, and the bridge has been made that wide. There is a four hundred feet span there which is being built. The sweep of the current is such as to take boats into this channel; and it is estimated that the span of four hundred feet there is equal to a span of five hundred and fifty feet anywhere else on the river. That is the fact about that. They are building a four hundred feet span there. The president of the road says that he would have built it five hundred feet just as quick if he had been required. Their engineer does not think there is any trouble about making it five hundred or six hundred feet.

Mr. HENDERSON. And that includes all the channel there is.

Mr. MORTON. That includes all the channel over the falls. The bridge is being built over the falls, right where the water breaks on the rocks. That is the fact about that bridge.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is satisfactory.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read it as follows:

That the Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall appoint a board of scientific engineers, to consist of not less than five nor more than seven, who shall report to the next session of Congress the proper width of spans in railroad bridges across the Ohio river adapted to the wants of navigation and commerce upon that river; and that until Congress shall by law take action upon said report no bridge shall be constructed over said river. And the said board of engineers shall also examine the bridge across the Ohio river at Steubenville and report whether it is any obstruction to the navigation of said river; and if so, to what extent, and what should be done to remedy such obstruction: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to the bridge now in process of construction at Louisville.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to add a few words to the last amendment, so as to make it conform to the statement made. I suppose no one will object to it. It is to add "and said bridge shall not be less than four hundred feet in the clear."

Mr. MORTON. Say "over the Indiana chute," to make it plain.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not care what chute it is over; I mean the main span, because my information is that the same difficulty occurs there.

Mr. MORTON. That is a good suggestion to go in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the proviso so that it will read:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to the bridge now in process of construction at Louisville, which bridge shall not be of less span than four hundred feet across the main channel of the river.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. POMEROY, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill in relation to bridges across the Ohio river."

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply desire to move that the resolution fixing the time of adjournment be taken up so that it may come up in order to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he desires to supersede the bill that I have charge of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not interfere with that. All I want is a vote fixing the time of adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the resolution mentioned by the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 21, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m.

The Journal of yesterday was partly read, when

Mr. DAWES moved that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The motion was, by unanimous consent, agreed to.

PAY OF SOUTHERN MEMBERS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to present a report from the Committee on the Judiciary relative to the pay of the members from the reconstructed States.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred a communication from certain members from Arkansas, and also a letter from the Sergeant-at-Arms addressed to the Speaker, touching the question of the pay of members from the reconstructed States, have directed me to report the following resolution, on which I demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the members of this House from the States of Arkansas, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana, are entitled to compensation from the date of their respective elections as members of the Fortieth Congress; and the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he hereby is, directed to pay said members in accordance with the terms of this resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMANDER AARON K. HUGHES.

On motion of Mr. PIKE, and by unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list, was taken from the Speaker's table, and read a first and second time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it the purpose to put this joint resolution on its passage now?

Mr. PIKE. The House has already passed upon this question and sent to the Senate a resolution for the restoration of Commanders Hughes and Cilley. This resolution from the Senate provides simply for the restoration of Commander Hughes. The proposition has already received the favorable consideration of the House.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIKE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATIVE FROM ALABAMA.

Mr. DAWES presented the credentials of Benjamin W. Norris, claiming a seat as a Representative from the third district of Alabama; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

PORTS OF ENTRY, NORTH AND SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. O'NEILL, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 1444) changing the ports of entry from Plymouth to Edenton, in North Carolina, and from Port Royal to Beaufort, in South Carolina; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that the port of entry in the Albemarle collection district be removed from Plymouth to Edenton, North Carolina, and also that Beaufort, South Carolina, be created a port of entry in lieu of Port Royal, which is abolished as a port of entry.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has this bill received the consideration of the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. O'NEILL. It has been favorably considered by that committee, who have directed me to report it. The passage of the bill is also recommended by the Treasury Department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL SYSTEM OF COINAGE.

Mr. KELLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1445) to promote the establishment of an international metrical system of coinage; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask that by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions be taken from the Speaker's table, that a committee of conference may be appointed on the Senate amendments.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object to taking anything from the Speaker's table out of its order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 343) to admit free of duty certain statutes.

It also announced that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 1376) for the relief of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 617) to reduce the military peace establishment of the United States, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

It also announced that the Senate further insisted on its amendment disagreed to by the House to a bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, and agreed to the conference asked for on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. RAMSEY, Mr. HARLAN, and Mr. BUCKALEW as managers of said conference on its part.

It announced, in conclusion, that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House, and agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. CONKLING, and Mr. DOOLITTLE managers of said conference on its part.

REPRESENTATION OF ALABAMA.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee of Elections have had before them the credentials of Francis W. Kellogg, Charles W. Buckley, Benjamin W. Norris, Charles W. Pierce, John B. Callis, and Thomas Houghy, claiming to be Representatives-elect from the State of Alabama, and have directed me to report that by the act of June 25, 1868, Alabama was admitted to representation upon this floor upon condition of ratifying the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution; and by the President's proclamation of the 20th of this month it appears that ratification has taken place and that their credentials are in the form prescribed by the ordinance of the convention of Alabama, and therefore to move that they be admitted to take the oath of office of the 2d of July, 1862.

Mr. BROOKS. I could not quite hear what the gentleman from Massachusetts said.

Mr. DAWES. Then I will repeat it. I stated that by the act of June 25, 1868, Alabama was entitled to representation upon this floor on the ratification by the Legislature of that State of the fourteenth article of the amendments to the Constitution, and the proclamation of the President of the 20th of this month has announced that ratification has taken place, and that their credentials were in due form of law as prescribed by the ordinance of the convention which adopted the constitution of the State. Nothing further appearing before the Committee of Elections, of course it has instructed me to report a prima facie case in respect to these gentlemen, and ask that they be admitted on taking the oath of office.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he is quite sure Alabama has ratified the constitutional amendment?

Mr. DAWES. In answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, whether I am quite sure Alabama has ratified the constitutional amendment, such is my confidence in the President of the United States that I cannot believe he would make a proclamation to that effect if it were not so.

Mr. BROOKS. That proclamation has not met my eye.

Mr. DAWES. It is in the morning's papers. If it has not met the gentleman's eye it is in a paper which has his confidence, the National Intelligencer.

Mr. BROOKS. The point to which I wish to call the gentleman's attention is the act of Congress of March 23, 1867, passed when we were assembled in special session more than a year ago. The fifth section of that act is as follows:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if, according to said returns, the constitution shall be ratified by a majority of the votes of the registered electors qualified as herein specified, cast at said election, (at least one half of all the registered voters voting upon the question of such ratification,) the president of the convention shall transmit a copy of the same, duly certified, to the President of the United States, who shall forthwith transmit the same to Congress, if then in session, and if not in session, then immediately upon its next assembling; and if it shall, moreover, appear to Congress that the election was one at which all the registered and qualified electors in the State had an opportunity to vote freely and without restraint, fear, or the influence of fraud, and if the Congress shall be satisfied that such constitution meets the approval of a majority of all the qualified electors in the State, and if the said constitution shall be declared by Congress to be in conformity with the provisions of the act to which this is supplementary, and the other provisions of said act shall have been complied with, and the said constitution shall be approved by Congress, the State shall be declared entitled to representation, and Senators and Representatives shall be admitted therefrom as therein provided."

Mr. Speaker, that act required a majority of the registered voters of the State for the adoption of the constitution. Instead of receiving that majority, on the contrary a majority of the registered voters of the State were against its adoption. The people declared their will by absence from the polls as prescribed in this law. This fact, I believe, is not denied by any gentleman—least of all by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The answer which I make to the gentleman is by calling his attention to an act of Congress of June 25, 1868, which is of later date than the one he refers to. One section of the act of June 25, 1868, is as follows:

"That each of the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, shall be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as States of the Union, when the Legislatures of said States shall have duly ratified the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress and known as article fourteen," &c.

This statute being of later date than the one the gentleman holds in his hand I suppose the gentleman is aware of the well-known principle of law, that if there is any conflict in the two the one I hold in my hand prevails.

Mr. BROOKS. The point to which I wish to call the attention of the House is that under the act from which the gentleman has just read no election whatsoever has taken place in Alabama. No members of Congress have been voted for under that act. The only act under which they have been voted for is the act of March 23, 1867.

Now, I put it to this House; and I put it to the country—I like to have said I put it to the common sense of this House, but that would be of no use—I put it to the party generosity of the majority of this House to say if, under the act of March 23, prescribing a certain course for election, a large majority of the people of Alabama refused or declined to vote for members of Congress, as permitted and authorized by this act, to such an extent that only one party voted, and that the negro party of the State, so that almost every white voter in the State abstained from the polls. I put it to the party generosity of this House; ay, I put it to the white men of this House, men of our race and color; ay, if the galleries were filled with negroes, I would leave it even to the negroes who so often surround us, if, when the white people of the State are thus deluded into the belief that no members of Congress were to be chosen but as the constitution was ratified, it is right, just, and honorable now to avail yourselves of a subsequent act of Congress, silent on the subject of electing members of Congress, and to take in these members thus declared to be previously elected. Sir, there is honor even in a primary meeting in the midst of party machinery; but there is no act more dishonorable than that. No greater fraud can possibly be perpetrated than by declaring members of Congress elected when they are chosen only by one party, this Congress having authorized the other party to abstain from voting at that election.

Sir, you have an ample majority in this House, and you have increased it largely in a few days past by numerous Representatives, or so-called Representatives, from that section of the country. Will you now avail yourselves of a mere technicality? No, not a technicality, for the last act of Congress in July does not say that members of Congress are elected; the phraseology, the declaration of the act is that Alabama shall be entitled to representation and shall be admitted to representation. I do not deny the effect or force of this act as understood by the majority of this House. I admit that under this act Alabama is entitled to admission and representation here. But I deny that members of Congress, or so-called members of Congress, were voted for under this act, or any other act whatsoever. No Representative from that State is entitled now to a seat on this floor. They can only be admitted here by this immense majority.

Sir, with this ample vote that you have, with the means of controlling two thirds or three fourths of this House at the present time, why not go back to the people of Alabama? Why not make an appeal to the colored voters of that State as well as to the white voters there to give them a fair and honorable representation? Why this insidious—I would use a stronger adjective if it were parliamentary upon the floor of this House—why this insidious, why this tortuous, reckless, labyrinthine way of bringing members upon the floor of this House, when by a tyrannical act you have authority to do it in a much more honorable and far more lofty way? Sir, it would not be proper for me to pronounce this a sneaking mode of electing members of Congress from Alabama, therefore I use no such word. But I do say it is an outrage upon the white people of Alabama. It is an outrage upon the whole white race of this country to force in here members of Congress from Alabama elected only by the negroes of that State when the white people by fraud, and by fraud alone, were kept from voting on the day of the election. Sir, I call for the yeas and nays to make a record in a case like this.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from New York has got off his accustomed speech upon occasions of this kind. I suppose no one doubted what it would be when he obtained the floor. Nobody is more alive to the interest of representation of States upon this floor than the gentleman from New York. I am astonished to find him now struggling to keep out upon all occasions representation from the late rebellious States. I remember that at the commencement of the last Congress, and of this also, the gentleman took the first opportunity to obtain the floor and to pronounce Congress unconstitutional without representation from these States. And yet he has failed of no opportunity to thwart as well as was in his power and to throw obstacles in the way of every movement that has been made toward securing that representation upon this floor. He talks of insidious and devious ways to secure representation upon this floor. No man upon this floor on that side of the House, much less the gentleman from New York, who now brings this charge against this side of the House, has lifted his finger from the time the men who represented those States upon this floor turned their backs upon the flag of their country and walked out of that door. No man upon that side of the House, and least of all the gentleman from New York, has lifted his finger to secure peaceful representation upon this floor from one of those States. And now, when gentlemen come here with credentials such as the gentleman from New York brought here, and they are referred to the Committee of Elections, and no tittle of evidence appears but what they are just as good a title as that which the gentleman from New York brought here, he rises at the last moment to make one more final struggle against the representation of these States upon this floor. Sir, it is for the gentleman and not for this side of the House to reconcile this twisting and devious way which he has chosen to pursue while preaching representation practically denying it.

Sir, there is one other thing which is quite as consistent and quite as admirable in the gentleman from New York, this constant anxiety of his about the negro, an anxiety which troubles him by day and disturbs his sleep by night, lest by some chance the poor negro may get some advantage of him in the race of life. It gives him no peace as he comes in and goes out to his daily work and daily toil lest some poor man from that downtrodden race may, in the free race of life, get the start of him. Sir, I need not say to the House that I have no sympathy with such anxiety on the part of the gentleman from New York. If he feels it necessary that by some constitutional enactment or by some act of Congress weights or clogs or bars should be put upon the negro lest he get the upper hand of him in a fair race for the emoluments, for the comforts, and for the honors even of this life, why let him advocate that which he feels it necessary on his part to establish lest that dire result may follow? But for my part and the part of those with whom I am associated on this side of the House, they have no such apprehension. They have no apprehension that this poor downtrodden race, if they have every opportunity and every path left open to them, will get any undue advantage of the white race. I have a better opinion of the race to which I belong than the gentleman from New York seems to have. I feel no necessity pressing upon me as one of the white race in this country to seek constitutional inhibitions upon any other race that God has planted upon the soil of this or any other country. Let all have a fair chance and he who can succeed let him enjoy the benefit of it. I now call the previous question.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. DAWES. I cannot yield.

Mr. BECK. I desire to have one of the certificates read, with its date.

Mr. DAWES. They are all at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will not retire under that demagogical speech he has just made.

The SPEAKER. That language is not in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why not? It is a compliment to his speech.

Mr. DAWES. Let one of the certificates be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF ALABAMA, City and county of Montgomery, ss.

I, E. W. Peck, president of the constitutional convention of the said State of Alabama, assembled at the capitol, in the said city of Montgomery, on Tuesday, the 8th day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1867, do hereby certify that at an election, held in the several counties of said State, on the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th days of February, in the year 1868, for the election of State and county officers, Francis W. Kellogg, was elected Representative to Congress from the first congressional district, State of Alabama.

In testimony whereof, I do hereto set my name at Montgomery, the 22d day of February, in the year last aforesaid.

E. W. PECK,
President of said Convention.

Mr. BECK. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yield to me for a moment, not to make a speech?

Mr. DAWES. I cannot; the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] occupied much more time than I did.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts considers the New York man half his match, though I do fully.

The question was upon seconding the previous question; and being taken, there were upon a division—yeas 90, noes 22.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the report of the Committee of Elections. Upon this question the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 33, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beatty, Benton Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Churchill, Rector W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gravelly, Hamilton, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Kelley, Ketchum, Keotz, Laffin, Lash, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Meeker, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Pollock, Pomeroy, Raum, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Selye, Shanks, Smith, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Sypher, Taffie, Taylor, Thomas, Upson, Van Arnum, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Beck, Boyer, Brooks, Cary, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Holtman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Phelps, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auken, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baker, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Chanler, Cornell, Dodge, Ela, Finney, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Munger, Myers, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Poland, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Roots, Shellabarger, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and James F. Wilson—52.

So the report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If the members-elect from Alabama are now in the Hall they will present themselves to take the oath of office.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask for the separate administration of the oath to the members.

The SPEAKER. That is subject to the decision of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. There are three cases to which I wish to call attention. I object to one of the members, I think the one from the Mobile district, upon the ground that he is not a resident of the State of Alabama.

Mr. DAWES. The member from the Mobile district is not present.

Mr. BROOKS. Who is the gentleman from the Mobile district?

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Kellogg.

Mr. BROOKS. Oh! yes; Mr. Kellogg, of Michigan.

Mr. DAWES. No; of Alabama. The gentleman is laboring under a mistake, as he usually is.

Mr. BROOKS. And then there is another from Maine to whom I object.

Mr. BROOMALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House is that the Representatives from Alabama be sworn in by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not suppose that the Speaker wants to violate the Constitution of the United States; and I ask him to read section two, article one, of that instrument.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] objects to one of these gentlemen because he was born in Maine. I would inquire of him where he himself was born. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOKS. I was born in the State of Maine, and went to New York with a trunk thirty years ago; I did not go there three months ago with a carpet-bag. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the point raised by the gentleman from New York. The Speaker is required to execute the order of the House, which is to administer the oath of office to the members-elect from the State of Alabama. If the House should order that the oath be administered to each separately, the Speaker will, of course, obey the order of the House; but without such order he will swear them in collectively.

Mr. ROSS. One of these gentlemen is a constituent of mine; but I do not raise any objection to him on that account. He is a very good man.

Mr. CHARLES W. BUCKLEY, Mr. BENJAMIN W. NORRIS, Mr. CHARLES W. PIERCE, Mr. J. B. CALLIS, and Mr. THOMAS HOUGHY, presented themselves at the Speaker's desk, and were duly qualified by taking the oath prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862.

VACANCIES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the question pending at the adjournment yesterday, being the report of the committee of conference on the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments. On the question of agreeing to the report the yeas and nays were ordered; and pending that question the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] moved that the report be laid on the table.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same. That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with the following amendment: strike out the word "and," in line three of said amendment, and insert after the word "second," in the same line, the words "and third;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: after the word "upon" in said amendment, strike out all to the end of the amendment, and insert in lieu the following words: "the examiner-in-chief in said office oldest in length of commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

THEODORE M. POMEROY,

WM. LAWRENCE,

Managers on the part of the House.

ROSCOE CONKLING,

WM. M. STEWART,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw the motion that the report be laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew the motion, and call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether the effect of laying the report on the table will not be to kill the bill, while if we should simply reject the report the question of the differences between the two Houses would still be open?

The SPEAKER. That will be the effect.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 112, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Barnes, Beck, Boyer, Cary, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Houghy, Holman, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Orth, Phelps, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aukon, Van Trump, Wood, and Woodward—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Broomwell, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Goss, Hamilton, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Lash, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Loughbridge, Mallory, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Mercier, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Morrill, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsley, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Sypher, Taylor, Thomas, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—112.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Bailey, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Brooks, Buckley, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Callis, Chanler, Cornell, Dockery, Dodge, Eggleston, Ela, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, French, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Logan, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, Maynard, McCormick, Morrissey, Munger, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Pierce, Pile, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taft, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Thomas Williams—68.

So the House refused to lay on the table the report of the committee of conference.

The question next recurred on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 77, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boles, Boutwell, Boyden, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Goss, Griswold, Heaton, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Judd, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, Lash, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughbridge, McCarthy, Mercier, Miller, Moorhead, Mullins, Orth, Pike, Plants, Poland, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Scofield, Selye, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Thomas, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—80.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Archer, Arnell, Axtell, Baker, Barnes, Beatty, Beck, Boyer, Broomwell, Brooks, Buckland, Callis, Cary, Cobb, Dixon, Eggleston, Eldridge, Fox, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Gravely, Grover, Haight, Houghy, Hawkins, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Loan, Logan, Mallory, Marshall, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, Moore, Morrell, Myers, Niblack, Nunn, O'Neill, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Polsley, Randall, Ross, Schenck, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Stokes, Sypher, Taber, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aukon, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—77.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Buckley, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Cake, Chanler, Coburn, Cornell, Dodge, Eckley, Farnsworth, Finney, Garfield, Halsey, Hamilton, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kelley, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, Morrissey, Munger, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Paine, Pierce, Pile, Price, Pruyn, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Taft, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, and Thomas Williams—58.

So the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. POMEROY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. No. 164) for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, to the active list from the retired list; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LYNCH was granted leave of absence on account of the sickness of his wife.

CHARLOTTE C. REED.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Charlotte C. Reed, copies of those to be left which the Clerk deems important.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 354) admitting steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1868.

It also announced that the Senate had adopted a concurrent resolution declaring the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

FOURTEENTH CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to take up the concurrent resolution just received from the Senate.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 21, 1868.

Whereas the Legislatures of the States of Connecticut, Tennessee, New Jersey, Oregon, Vermont, West Virginia, Kansas, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Minnesota, New York, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Nebraska, Maine, Iowa, Arkansas, Florida, North Carolina, and Louisiana, being three fourths and more of the several States of the Union, have ratified the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, duly proposed by two thirds of each House of the Thirty-Ninth Congress; Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That said fourteenth article is hereby declared to be a part of the Constitution of the United States, and it shall be duly promulgated as such by the Secretary of State.

Attest: GEO. C. GORHAM, Secretary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is an important question, and should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We will pass it now if the gentleman from Massachusetts will give way.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw the motion to refer, and move that the resolution be concurred in; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is there any information in the possession of the House that Georgia has ratified that fourteenth article?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has a dispatch. Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let it be read.

Mr. BROOKS. I object unless we have read the withdrawal by Ohio and New Jersey of their assent to that amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts read the dispatch as part of his speech.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Suppose the gentleman from Illinois makes the speech for him.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. He can make a speech for the gentleman from Wisconsin much better than the gentleman can for himself.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman does the most of the talking for him.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and ask the Clerk to read the dispatch which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, July 21, 1868.

To SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker House of Representatives:

Fourteenth article and fundamental conditions adopted by majority of thirty-four on joint ballot.

RUFUS D. BULLOCK,

Governor-elect.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the State of Alabama will be included in the resolution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the resolution by inserting "Georgia."

Mr. BROOKS. On a mere private telegram? How do you know that that came over the wires?

Mr. BROOMALL. We take it on faith.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts whether this is an official notice such as is required. It should be sent by mail.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw the motion to amend.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to propound a question to the gentleman from Massachusetts—whether this dispatch came into his hands through the post-mortem examination committee?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Or whether it was a captured telegram that came in a legitimate way of business?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the proposition is divisible. I call for a separate vote on the preamble.

The SPEAKER. It is divisible; a separate vote will be taken on the preamble. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 127, nays 83, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Callie, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Hamilton, Houghsey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Stevens, Taylor, John Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—55.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The question recurred on agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 127, nays 35, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Broomall, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick B. So the preamble was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to amend the vote by which the preamble was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Martha Ann Wallace; and

An act (H. R. No. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (S. No. 507) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States pending at the adjournment on Saturday evening and now reached in the regular order. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is entitled to the floor for fifty-eight minutes of his hour.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have made some verbal amendments in the substitute which I proposed on Saturday last, which I will send to the Clerk's desk. They do not change the substance, and it is not necessary that they should be read at present.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to know whether there will be one vote on the entire substitute, whether it must be adopted or rejected by a single vote?

The SPEAKER. When debate closes the first question will be on the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to perfect the original bill, and then the question will be on striking it all out, as amended, and inserting the substitute proposed.

Mr. RANDALL. Then we shall have to take the whole of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts or none of it.

The SPEAKER. Unless the previous question shall be moved amendments to the substitute will be in order, provided they shall be such as have been considered in Committee of the Whole. If they have received their first consideration in Committee of the Whole they can be offered, but not otherwise.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the House will give me ear for ten or fifteen minutes, I will endeavor to state the features of the substitute, and especially the particulars in which it differs from the bill as it came from the Senate and from the bill which was adopted by the House in Committee of the Whole.

The Senate bill provides for the funding of the entire interest-paying debt, with the exception of the five per cent. bonds known as ten-forties and the three per cent. certificates; the new bonds to be made payable at different times and with different rates of interest, covering, considering the entire scope of the bill, $1,800,000,000 of the public debt.

The bill reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole provides for the funding of the entire interest-bearing public debt, amounting to $2,150,000,000, all of it payable in coin upon forty years time, and at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. rate of interest.

The amendment to which I wish to call the attention of the House provides for the funding of $1,200,000,000 of the public debt; $400,000,000 payable in fifteen years at five per cent. interest; $400,000,000 payable in twenty years at four and a half per cent. interest; and $400,000,000 payable in twenty-five years at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. interest; the latter sum of $400,000,000 payable, principal and interest, at the option of the taker, either in the United States, or at London, Paris, or Frankfurt.

The latter proposition, that $400,000,000 may be made payable abroad, is submitted upon this ground. A portion of our public debt is already due abroad; and the parties who hold that amount are subjected every six months to a pretty heavy tax, to something like one half of one per cent., I understand, in expenses incurred in the collection of the interest coupons. The Government of the United States of course could place funds in London or Paris or Frankfurt at a very much less cost than is now incurred by the holders of the bonds. By making the bonds payable abroad we induce foreigners to exchange existing bonds for those bearing a lower rate of interest, we subjecting ourselves to the expense of placing the funds there, which can be done by the Government at much less cost than the holders of bonds would be required to pay in the form of discount upon the coupons.

Therefore the advantage of this plan resolves itself into an ability on our part to obtain funds at a less rate of interest, including the expense of placing the money abroad to meet payments, than we should be obliged to pay if the parties holding the bonds, incurred the expense of collecting the interest on this side of the Atlantic every six months.

I wish to call the attention of the House to some of the advantages of the amendment which I have proposed. In presenting those advantages I am obliged to state, not for the purpose of antagonism, and certainly with the desire to avoid all personal antagonism, what seems to me to be an objection to the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole. That bill, as gentlemen very well know, contemplates a postponement of the payment of any of the interest-bearing public debt for forty years. To my mind this is an insuperable objection. We shall this current year—and I state it after examination—we shall this current year, notwithstanding the changes that have been made in our system of taxation, pay the interest on the public debt, the current expenses of the Government, reduced as they have been by this Congress to something like one hundred and six million dollars, excluding bounties and pensions, and also pay $50,000,000 of the principal of the public debt.

When we consider the rapid development of the resources of this country, its increase of population, and the augmentation of wealth, there is no hazard in the prediction that our excess of revenue to be applied to the liquidation of the public debt will not be less in any future year than it will be in the present year.

Now, sir, a nation is distinguished from individuals in its financial affairs in the particular I am now considering. If an individual owes a debt, due five or ten years hence, and has money which he could now apply to that debt, if it be not in the terms of the contract that he shall pay it immediately, he may use that money in various other pursuits, in business, in enterprises, or even hazards, and pay his debt when it matures. But a government is differently situated. Unless it be absolute poverty in the national Treasury, I know of no condition of things more disadvantageous to public credit than the possession of large funds in the Treasury without any present means of using those funds in a legitimate and proper way.

I need not state here how it is impossible for the Government to engage in any proper enterprise for the use of its funds, nor how the possession of surplus funds gives rise to schemes, speculations, and frauds, affecting perniciously the character and credit of a country. It is urged by the friends of the forty-year loan that only a part of the loan offered will be taken by the public creditors. This may be so, but I am considering not what may be funded under the system proposed by the Committee of the Whole; I am considering what is contemplated by the provisions of the bill, assuming in what I say that we do not ask the world to accept as a measure of public policy a measure which we ourselves do not favor. If we pass a bill for the funding of $2,150,000,000 of the public debt, I suppose we do it upon the ground that we hope, if we do not absolutely expect, that the public will accept the proposition we make, and that the proposition, if accepted, would be advantageous to us.

Of course, sir, I object to this proposition, assuming that it is to be accepted, because, if accepted, it will be disadvantageous to us even at the low rate of interest proposed in the bill. In the first place it lays upon the people of this country a debt of $2,150,000,000 which for forty years they will have no legitimate, lawful means of lifting. I think that a great evil. Not a dollar of this vast amount can be paid except by going into the markets of the world and buying up the obligations. In case of war we should have occasion to borrow money, for no nation is or ever can be wealthy enough to carry on a war without credit and without the use of its credit. With a debt of about two thousand million dollars postponed for thirty or forty years, the credit of the country would be materially affected. But in the next place, with the accumulation of revenue, we should be placed in the hands of the holders of the public funds.

In the bill which I submit to the House I have sought to accomplish three objects. The first of these is the reduction of the interest on the public debt. This is secured by the bill which I propose to the extent of $19,400,000 a year. I have sought in the next place to put the Government out of the hands of the public creditors, so that they cannot compel us to pay, except when it is convenient for us to pay; and if $1,200,000,000 of the public debt be funded in the manner I propose there will remain $1,018,000,000 of the public debt, bearing interest, for which provision will not have been made. This amount I leave as it is, that we may, as we say in the country, "come and go upon it" for the next fifteen years.

Mr. Speaker, I have made no provision for $1,018,000,000 of the interest-bearing public debt. This is made up of three hundred million dollars or thereabouts of five-twenties, which may be paid in five years or less, but which we cannot be compelled to pay before the expiration of twenty years from the issue. These five-twenties, after five years, can be taken in by the Government if it should be our interest to do so; but the public creditors cannot compel us to pay them until twenty years from date. In the next place there are of the ten-forties outstanding, for which I make no provision, $220,000,000. These will be due in six or seven years, so that we may pay them; but the Government cannot be compelled to pay them within thirty years. Then there are $284,000,000 of the six per cent. bonds payable absolutely in the year 1881, which, according to the terms of the contract, must then be paid. There is of the matured debt $11,000,000. There is also the currency debt amounting to $203,000,000. So that in the whole there will be $1,018,000,000 which we may, if we choose, pay in the next fifteen years. But of this $1,018,000,000 there are only $75,000,000, which, according to the pledge we have given to the world, we can be called upon to pay before 1881; and in that year we shall be called upon to pay $284,000,000 only. So that, as a matter of fact, we shall be left in the best possible condition with reference to the application of such revenues as may accrue during the next fifteen years. That is, we may pay $1,000,000,000 of the public debt, if we have the means and the disposition to pay it; but if we have not, we cannot be compelled to pay but about three hundred and fifty millions of the public debt during the next fifteen years.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt myself that this thousand millions will be paid in the next fifteen years by the energy and by the resources of this country. And I wish to call the attention of the House to a fact deduced by careful examination of statistics obtained from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, showing that during the last three years we have with our resources and the revenue of this country secured a large diminution of the public debt. I confess, that after the careful examination I had made, I felt compelled to review it to see whether there was not some mistake in the premises or in the calculation, so astonishing is the evidence thus furnished of the ability of the people of the country to liquidate the public debt. From the 1st day of April, 1865, to the 1st day of January, 1868, two years and nine months, we have paid out of the public Treasury $1,552,000,000 of money. Upon a careful analysis of the expenditures of the Government during those two years and nine months, I find that the expenses of a peace establishment, excluding interest, pensions, and bounties, upon the basis of the year 1866 and 1867, when the expenses of the Government were $70,000,000 more than they are to be the present year amounted to $485,000,000, showing that we paid over and above those expenses $1,066,000,000. On the 1st day of April, 1865, the public debt, liquidated and ascertained, was $2,866,000,000, and the $1,066,000,000 which we paid between the 1st of April, 1865 and the 1st of January, 1868, would have been added to the public debt as proper expenses of the war if we had not out of the public revenue from day to day liquidated it. If we add to the $2,366,000,000 public debt on the 1st of April, 1865, $1,066,000,000 which we paid for war expenses including interest on the war debt, pensions, and bounties between the 1st of April, 1865, and the 1st of January, 1868, we find that on the 1st of January, 1868, the public debt, if we had not paid expenses of the war out of the ordinary revenue, would have amounted to $3,432,000,000. In the face of this great fact, that in two years and nine months, by extraordinary taxation and extraordinary efforts to be sure, we paid $1,066,000,000 of the public debt, are we to assume that hereafter the people of this country are not annually to make considerable payments of the public debt of the country? Almost one third of the entire public debt of the country has been paid in two years and nine months, and I am not willing to stand upon the assumption that we shall not make large payments in each year hereafter.

My objection to the proposition as it comes from the Committee of the Whole is of the most serious character in this: that it puts it out of the power of the people of the country to pay the public debt unless they go into the markets of the world and buy it up. Now, there are two facts in our own history to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and which show how impolitic it would be for us to put ourselves in the hands of the public creditors. On the 4th of August, 1790, under the lead of Mr. Hamilton, there were issued three per cent. bonds. Those bonds, bearing interest of three per cent., were never worth for the purposes of investment more than sixty cents on the dollar; but in 1832, under the administration of General Jackson, the public debt had been so diminished and the public revenue so augmented that the public creditors foresaw that these three per cent. bonds would soon be taken up. What happened? They advanced in price at once, so that the last $346,000 of those three per cent. bonds were actually redeemed by the payment of $326,000 in gold. Are we, when we are proposing for a loan at three and sixty-five hundredths, to put ourselves in a like position? Again, during the Mexican war, we issued six per cent. bonds, but before the administration of Mr. Polk closed, the Secretary of the Treasury went into the market and bought those bonds at $1 28 for every dollar the public creditors had loaned to the Government. In this view of the case, I say to the House that the question of interest is altogether unimportant as compared with the question I am now considering. If the public creditors would take this $2,150,000,000 of loan without interest, I would not let them have it for the term of forty years; for within forty years they would compel the people of this country, under the circumstances which are sure to arise, to pay more premium than the accumulated interest at four or five per cent.

My third proposition is that we must keep the loan so that we can control it ourselves—pay it when we choose. First, then, the bill contemplates a reduction of interest, keeps in the possession of the Government the power to pay when it pleases, and puts it out of the power of our creditors to compel us to pay when we do not choose to pay.

Sir, this debt looks pretty large, but it is a small debt for this country when you consider that we paid $1,000,000,000 in less than three years. What is to be said of the $2,000,000,000 remaining? Why, sir, when the war of 1812 closed our public debt was $127,000,000. That does not look large to us, but it was as heavy a debt for the seven millions of people in the United States at that time, considering that a day's labor would not produce more than thirty-three per cent. in gold of what it will produce now, as the $2,000,000,000 of debt is to the people of the country at the present time.

I have still further to say in support of the measure which I have proposed, that it is in the line of the bill which came to us from the Senate, while the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole is a departure from what appears to be the policy of the Senate, a policy in which generally I concur. Inasmuch as these propositions are to go to a committee of conference, I submit to the House that the wiser way is to offer as the judgment of the House a measure which in its general policy conforms to the measure submitted by the Senate rather than to offer to the Senate a measure which, in all its substantive features, is very decidedly, if not diametrically opposed to what appears to be the policy of the Senate bill.

A MEMBER. Would you allow the Senate to legislate for both Houses?

Mr. BOUTWELL. No, sir; I would not; but if the judgment of this House on the whole is that the general policy of the Senate, not speaking of a particular provision, is a wise policy then we ought in good sense and in common fairness and with ordinary legislative wisdom to frame our bill so that it shall harmonize as far as possible with the bill of the Senate.

There is in the bill I have submitted a proposition for a sinking fund, and which I have introduced because I consider that the act of 1862 requires us to establish a sinking fund whenever the means of the Government permit. That time has already arrived. I do not object, however, if any gentleman on the floor desires to strike out the proposition for a sinking fund, to submit that question to the judgment of the House. It is no essential part of the funding system, but I consider that in good faith we are bound to establish a sinking fund for the payment of a portion of the public securities.

I have also provided in this bill a section which I do consider important. We have had in the Treasury of the United States during the last two years from seventy to one hundred million dollars in gold. No man in private life would ever allow gold or any other money to accumulate and lie without interest in the manner that the Government of this country has permitted gold to remain in the Treasury. But, sir, as a general proposition I am opposed to the sale of gold when the gold itself is already pledged to particular purposes. Some time ago, and upon my motion in this House, we gave the Secretary of the Treasury power to anticipate the payment of interest on the public debt. On one or two occasions that power has been exercised, but it never has been exercised so as to produce any considerable beneficial effect either in saving interest or in affecting the market price of gold.

The country, it seems to me, ought to be astonished by a single fact which I am about to state. In 1865, with $900,000,000 of paper circulating medium, gold stood at about 128. We have reduced the paper circulation to $710,000,000, a reduction of more than $180,000,000, and gold has advanced to something like 143. I cannot explain the reason for this in full, but I do not doubt that one cause of the increased price of gold is the accumulation of gold in the Treasury of the United States. We started in 1865, I think, with about thirty million dollars of gold in the Treasury. We have gone on diminishing the amount of paper in circulation and accumulating gold in the Treasury, and the price of gold has continually advanced. If the theory is correct which was here announced three years ago that a decrease in the paper circulation of the country would produce a corresponding decrease in the price of gold, gold should be to-day at 103 instead of 143. We have produced by this process of accumulating gold in the Treasury an artificial condition of things in the country. If the General Government were to go into the purchase of wheat or cotton and accumulate, as I suppose we have accumulated of gold, one fourth or one third of the entire quantity in the country, it would not be strange to us if cotton and wheat advanced, and it is not strange to me that gold advances when we are engaged in accumulating it in the public Treasury.

I object to the sale of gold. If we require the Secretary of the Treasury to advertise that he will be ready at any time to pay the interest on the debt next to become due, the public creditors abating the interest on the payments which he makes to them, there will always be an opportunity for those who own coupons, or those who choose to buy coupons, to command the gold that is in the Treasury, and at any rate the amount which he advertises that he will pay upon demand is so much gold upon the markets of the country. The difference between this proposition and the proposition to sell gold, is that we pay out gold where it is to be paid and relieve ourselves of interest becoming due next October, next November, or next January, and also improve the credit of the country. Coupled with that is a provision prohibiting all sales of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury. I need not make any suggestions to this House in the way of reasons or arguments in favor of taking from the Secretary a power which if honestly exercised can never be productive of any good whatsoever. I will now yield to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. I have spoken longer than I supposed I should when I began.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my strength to-day will enable me to avail myself of the opportunity of speaking for a very few minutes. I am glad, however, that the gentleman who offered the substitute for the bill as it comes from the Committee of the Whole has entered into the explanation that he has, and I desire to add only to that explanation which he has given of the difference between his proposition and that presented by the Committee of Ways and Means and modified by the Committee of the Whole a general statement of a difference to which he has not particularly adverted—a difference which to me, however, I confess is everything. The bill as it went to the Committee of the Whole, as it came virtually from the Committee of Ways and Means, is a bill providing for the consolidation of the public debt of the country. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is not a scheme for consolidation. The bill of the committee proposes to afford an opportunity, progressing from year to year in investments for that purpose, of converting the existing debt of the country into a long bond at low interest, thus meeting, as I think, on the one hand, public expectation, and putting the credit of the Government of the United States upon that footing which it is entitled to hold among the Governments of the world, and meeting, obviating, and dismissing the annoying question which arises in regard to the inequality in the advantages of property held by investments of public securities free from taxation and the other property of the country. I do not believe there is any other way in which that question can be so wisely and so fairly met and disposed of and the difficulties connected with it avoided.

Now, sir, the plan of the committee is for a bond at forty years with a low rate of interest at three and sixty-five hundredths, that bond to have value given to it for purposes of investment—permanent investment in one sense it may be said—by the length of time that it is to run and by its being surrounded by all the securities against taxation or burden of any kind upon the property so invested, so that the purchaser of the bond knows precisely what his property is, what he will be entitled to receive, all of which he will receive, and subject to no deductions whatever. What is the gentleman's proposition? To have three classes of bonds, one with interest payable in coin at fifteen years at a rate of five per cent. interest; another at four and a half per cent. interest, to run twenty years, and another to run twenty-five years, to be payable abroad and at a rate of interest the same that is provided in the bill from the committee, three and sixty-five hundredths.

By the very proposition which the gentleman makes he recommends the value of giving length to the time that the bond has to run, and seems to estimate that value at the rate of one half of one per cent. variation in the interest for five years. This would of course have its limits. But starting from his initial point he allows a deduction in the rate of interest of one half of one per cent. for the five years between fifteen and twenty years; thus affording, in that indirect way, an argument in favor of the long bond which the committee proposes.

Now, my objection to all this classification arises mainly from the fact that it is after all but a continuance of the present system. We have now a variety of bonds of different classes in which investments are made, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] proposes to add three more classes to those we now have, some of them running pari passu with some of the classes of bonds now existing. His scheme is not one for consolidation. It is not a system by which the public debt is to be reduced to one uniform character as is proposed by the bill reported from the committee. And in this, as I said at the beginning, exists the main difference between the two plans; a difference which, in my opinion, is vital, as affording an objection against this multiplication of classes of bonds, instead of resorting at once to the scheme of consolidation.

But the gentleman objects that if you afford an opportunity by law for the consolidation of the whole public debt into a class of bonds all falling due at the same time, you do not provide for meeting the obligations of the Government from year to year; and he carried that idea so far in the first draft of his amendment—for I beg leave to say that this substitute he has now offered is very different from his original fanciful substitute—that he provided for and extended through a number of years, redeeming $50,000,000 of the public debt in each year. And so far as his last class of bonds for $500,000,000 were concerned, they were to begin on the thirty-sixth year, by the redemption of $50,000 a year, and extending to the forty-fifth year, I think.

Now, I do not appreciate the force of the obligation, when practically considered, that the Government would not be able to provide from time to time and from year to year, for this debt as the debt might be falling due. It is true that by a scheme of consolidation you propose to fund the whole debt in a bond having a given time to run. But it does not follow that those bonds will all be taken in the first year, or the second year, or the third year. But it is the initial step, the entering wedge, subject to modification by subsequent legislation, providing for taking hold of the debt with a view of giving it uniformity, and with a view to establishing as a system of finance for the Government hereafter, that that debt shall be represented by bonds that shall have a long time to run, and which shall draw but a low rate of interest.

There is a provision, contained I think in the eighth section of the bill as it came from the Committee of Ways and Means—for this was an amendment added in Committee of the Whole on the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means—which indicates the policy the committee would have adopted in regard to this matter; that while there is to be a consolidation of the public debt, there shall not at the same time be in continuance upon the statute-book a variety of acts, under one and the other of which the Secretary of the Treasury or the financial officers of the Government may be at liberty from year to year to increase our debts in different shapes. By this section it is provided—

"That on and after the passage of this act all authority under any existing law to issue bonds or interest-bearing Treasury notes, or obligations of the United States shall cease and determine: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the conversion of Treasury notes known as seven-thirties into five-twenty bonds," &c.

The object of this was to prevent that emission of ten-forty bonds which has been taking place for some time past, in one instance to the extent of $8,000,000, and of other bonds, upon the faith and under the authority of laws still standing upon the statute-book, thus keeping up from year to year this variety in the forms of our public debt. The policy which I advocate is to wipe out as far as practicable all these distinctions, and come, at first gradually, afterward more rapidly, under a provision the foundation of which we propose shall be laid now, to a general consolidation of the whole debt at a low rate of interest, and with such length of time to run as will enable us to command credit in the markets of the world at that rate of interest.

I am, for one, hopeful that by commencing in this way we may bring about at no distant period such a condition of things that the United States Government, with all our immense resources, with all our extraordinary capabilities upon which to found credit, shall not be compelled to hawk its bonds around the world, seeking to make terms of payment at this, that, or the other foreign city, or upon this, that, or the other rate of high interest, in order to command that credit to which I think those resources should entitle us.

But the condition of my health admonishes me that I cannot venture to-day to continue this discussion further than to call the attention of the House to what is really the question as to the principal features of difference in the two systems presented. That question is this: shall we commence now a system of consolidation, issuing our bonds of such character and for such time as that we may command credit at a low rate of interest; or shall we go on multiplying in the securities we may put forth the varieties of shape that have heretofore been given to the evidences of our public debt, so as to keep up for an unlimited period this same system of temporary expedients for different lengths of time, and under different circumstances, and at different rates?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the propositions which have been discussed by the gentlemen who have just spoken. I wish simply to call the attention of the House to the fact that there are three propositions now pending before the House: first, the Senate proposition; second, the proposition of the Committee of Ways and Means as modified by the Committee of the Whole; and third, the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, the Senate bill contains provisions which are superior to either that of the Committee of Ways and Means or that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. The most important provision in this whole matter, as it seems to me, is that allowing contracts to be made in gold. The Senate adopted the provision, carefully guarded, that hereafter any person who chooses may make a contract payable in gold. It was an indication on their part that possibly at some time hereafter, however distant, gold and silver may again form a currency in this country. It was recognizing that fact in a very unobtrusive way, to say that the people of this country, who are now practically debarred from the use of gold and silver, may, if they please, make contracts payable in that currency. To me that was the attractive feature of the Senate bill. But that was struck out by the Committee of Ways and Means, and their position has been sustained by the Committee of the Whole.

Another provision in the Senate bill was for higher rates of interest than those provided by the Committee of Ways and Means. I endeavored in the Committee of the Whole to get the rate of interest fixed at a practical point. I am as desirous as any gentleman here to go home to my constituents and say that I voted for a low rate of interest; but I do not wish to be absurd about it. I wish to go home and tell them that I voted for a rate of interest at which I think these loans can be taken; but I submit, Mr. Speaker, whether it be not somewhat absurd to say to a man now holding our bonds with interest at six per cent.

payable in gold, "You may voluntarily, without the slightest compulsion, exchange those bonds which have now practically fifteen years to run for bonds with interest at three and sixty-five hundredths in gold." Would any of us be willing to make such an exchange? I desired to fix the rate of interest at four per cent., which seemed to be as low as would induce the taking of the bonds. We might try it at that rate, and if it could be done no harm would result.

The Committee of the Whole have presented to this House for its adoption the further proposition that those who took our bonds in the dark hours of war, when it was a patriotic impulse that moved them to do it, shall be taxed five per cent. upon the interest arising from them, and that the tax shall be paid when the interest is paid out to them; but that the foreigner, who bought bonds at second-hand after the war had proved that this Republic would live and would pay, and the national banks, which come into existence after this war was practically decided at Vicksburg and Gettysburg, and bought bonds as a matter of business, shall not be taxed the same as the man who took them from a patriotic purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask the gentleman from Maine a question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will, if it does not give rise to debate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine, as it is in the line of his argument, and as he has said he would not allow the creditor, that he would not insult the public creditor to ask him to take—

Mr. PIKE. I did not say anything about insulting him, but that it was absurd to offer it to him.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Very well. Now, is he willing and in favor of paying those creditors whose debts are now due in "greenbacks?"

Mr. PIKE. If we had the "greenbacks," I would, but we have not the "greenbacks."

Mr. ELDRIDGE. You are in favor of paying in "greenbacks?"

Mr. PIKE. Certainly I am, if we had the "greenbacks;" but I am not in favor of issuing a batch of "greenbacks" for that purpose. Is the gentleman in favor of that?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am in favor of paying the five-twenties now out in that way.

Mr. PIKE. Is the gentleman willing to issue "greenbacks" for that purpose?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want the gentleman to answer me.

Mr. PIKE. I am in favor of paying "greenbacks" if we had them, but not having them we can pay no "greenbacks." Is the gentleman in favor of issuing "greenbacks" for the purpose of paying them?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am in favor of withdrawing the national currency in order to supply its place with "greenbacks," and pay our debts. How is the gentleman on the subject?

Mr. PIKE. Would that give us a single dollar with which to pay the bonds if we succeeded in taking up the $300,000,000 of national bank circulation with "greenbacks?"

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman answer as candidly and as fairly as I have?

Mr. PIKE. You have not answered at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the gentleman in favor of withdrawing the national currency and supplying its place with "greenbacks?"

Mr. PIKE. I am willing to withdraw paper of every kind as soon as possible, and to go at once to a specie basis. I would make gold national and paper sectional.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does not the gentleman know we have not gold enough to pay our debts?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MULLINS. Regular order!

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The regular order on that side is to cut off debate on this side of the House.

Mr. MYERS. I hope the time will be extended, so as to allow the gentleman from Wisconsin to answer the question.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. MYERS. Sufficient time to answer the question.

Mr. MULLINS. I object.

Mr. PIKE. The question is, Will the gentleman from Wisconsin issue "greenbacks" for the purpose of paying the public debt?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Perhaps I am practicing upon the good nature of my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It is the best practice the gentleman has been engaged in.

Mr. PIKE. It is difficult to get the gentleman to answer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have answered without reserve, but the gentleman from Maine does not answer at all.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only wish to say in reply to the remarks made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that the question whether our bonds shall be all of one sort and payable at the same time is to me, and I believe to the tax-payers of the country, a very unimportant matter compared with such a disposition of the public indebtedness as shall enable us to pay our obligations when it is convenient for us to do so. I think that the point to be reached is a more important one even than the rate of interest that we pay. When the Committee of Ways and Means reported three and sixty-five hundredths interest I had doubts whether any loan would be taken anywhere at that rate; but I am pretty well satisfied that a large portion of the present securities will be exchanged early into a long loan at three and sixty-five hundredths interest, both principal and interest payable in coin, and payable abroad.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to know what warrant the gentleman has for that statement. Where does he get his knowledge that our creditors will exchange a six per cent. bond for a bond paying only three and sixty-five hundredths interest?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There is a doubt existing as to the nature of the obligation assumed by the country in regard to the five-twenties bonds.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you think they will do that yourself?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am of opinion that three-fourths of all the bonds held abroad will be exchanged into the bonds contemplated by the third clause of the first section of the amendment which I propose. I am of that opinion from information received from German bankers, and I am of that opinion from my own reflections as to what would be their interest.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Do you believe these five-twenties bonds are payable in gold?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Ah!

Mr. RANDALL. That is the milk in the cocoanut.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will state exactly what my opinion is upon that subject. When we issued $500,000,000 of five-twenties we stipulated to the public creditors that the United States notes known as greenbacks should never be issued in excess of $400,000,000. That was the first stipulation. The second stipulation was that we would not compel payment over five years. But there was a stipulation over and above the law, inherent in the very nature of society, in the experience and tradition of all mankind, that every nation in its senses, actuated by an honest purpose, if when struggling with vicissitudes it was obliged to resort to forced loans and extraordinary means of raising money by which its credit was impaired and its securities are forced below the par value of gold; that such a nation should make every honest effort possible for the redemption of specie payments and the restoration of its public credit. That obligation rests upon us. Now, if according to the terms of the act of 1862, it does not appear beyond all cavil that we might not pay these bonds in greenbacks, in the same act it does appear that we shall never issue more than $400,000,000 of greenbacks.

Mr. PIKE. If the gentleman will allow me, the act of 1862 does not so provide.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I mean the act of 1864. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. There has been no opportunity for this side to say a word.

NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. DONNELLY submitted the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill of the House (No. 554) making a grant of land to aid the State of Minnesota in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment to said bill.

ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
JAMES HARLAN,
C. A. BUCKALEW

Managers on the part of the Senate.

I. DONNELLY,
L. W. ROSS,
HORACE MAYNARD.

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ARNELL. Will it be in order to move to lay the whole bill on the table?

The SPEAKER. The Senate having agreed to recede from its amendment the bill is now passed, as both branches have concurred in the remainder of the bill. Therefore the motion to lay it on the table cannot be entertained. There is no formal action required on the report. The bill is passed.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The House resumed the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts now yield to me?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The gentleman from Wisconsin will understand that I have no further control of the time. I think at this period of the session, and after all the debate that has been had on the funding bill, it would not be proper for me at least to open the subject for debate. I suppose if the previous question shall be sustained under the rules the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will have an hour for debate. What will be his pleasure I cannot say.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is now entitled to the floor for one hour to close the debate.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] what time he desires.

Mr. PIKE. I hope he will answer my question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I only want four or five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have a few minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to the gentleman afterward.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think I answered the question of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] most emphatically.

Mr. PIKE. That question was—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman will hold still a minute, I will state both his position and mine as I understand it. I asked the gentleman from Maine whether he was in favor of paying off the principal of the five-twenties now due in greenbacks. The gentleman says he is in favor of paying them in greenbacks, but that we have not greenbacks to pay them. I think that is the position of the gentleman from Maine. Now, then, the debt is due.

Mr. PIKE. I asked you the question—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Not quite yet. If the gentleman pleases, he will hold himself in reserve for a minute. The debt is due; payment may be made, and we have not, according to the gentleman from Maine, greenbacks to pay it. I suppose, therefore, he would pay the debt in gold.

Mr. PIKE. We have not the gold.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Now, I ask the gentleman from Maine, and he may answer me if he will do it without much circumlocution, whether we have gold to pay that debt, and whether we could now pay that debt any better in gold than in greenbacks.

Mr. PIKE. We shall have about thirty-eight million dollars of gold left in the Treasury after paying for Alaska, and there is $500,000,000 of five-twenties bonds redeemable.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then it must appear to everybody that to pay in gold is an impossibility. Now, there was a time some years ago when there was large indebtedness between individual citizens of the country, and Congress, of which the gentleman from Maine was then a component part, passed a law making greenbacks a legal tender in payment of all debts, excepting in certain specified cases—payment of customs duties, &c.—which are upon the back of the greenback itself. The gentleman and his party charge that if we undertake to pay that debt as they required citizen to pay citizen we are attempting repudiation, or acting in the way of repudiation.

Mr. PIKE. I do not charge that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman does not charge it. That may, perhaps, quiet some of the political papers of the country that are constantly charging upon the Democratic party that they are in favor of repudiation because they are in favor of paying precisely according to their agreement. Now, I do say, and gentlemen may make what they can of it, that that law when it was passed and took effect was to a certain extent a law by which a considerable amount of the indebtedness of this country was actually repudiated, and I charge repudiation upon the gentleman and his party in the passage of that act, and you may make the most of it. It did repudiate. Every man who owed a debt paid less than he had agreed to pay because he paid in a depreciated currency. The party who are now so sensitive on the subject of repudiation and charge that we are in favor of repudiation then passed a law by which a large proportion of the indebtedness of this country was actually repudiated.

Mr. PIKE. Now, will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] that if we have not enough greenbacks to pay the five-twenties bonds now due, just withdraw the national bank currency, for which you are paying daily a premium, and supply its place with greenbacks, and pay so much of the debt as that difference will be.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am told that is repudiation. Now, I think the gentleman from Maine will agree that I have answered his question.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman now answer a question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No; I would rather the gentleman would answer the question I put to him, and I will give him the opportunity.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] says it is—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. No, no; answer the question.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman said he would take $300,000,000 of the banking currency of the country from circulation, and pay out for it $300,000,000 of greenbacks. I then asked him, having done that, how he is going to pay the national debt with the same greenbacks which he pays to the banks?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We take up $300,000,000 of bonds in that way.

Mr. PIKE. No, sir. How far ahead is he after he has paid $300,000,000 of greenbacks to the banks?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SCHENCK] will allow the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] time to answer my question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will extend the gentleman's time five minutes longer, as he has been interrupted so much.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. All I want to get is an answer from the gentleman from Maine, if I can extract one from him, to the question I put to him.

Mr. PIKE. What is the question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the gentleman in favor of paying off the five-twenties now due in greenbacks or in gold?

Mr. PIKE. There are none of those bonds now due. If there were any of them due, and we had a surplus of greenbacks in the Treasury, to the extent of that surplus I maintain that the Government has a right to pay them in that way. Those greenbacks are a legal tender and "lawful money," and to that extent the Government has a right to pay its debts in greenbacks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The right of the Government to do so I have no doubt of.

Mr. PIKE. And then and thereafter it is the policy of this Government to redeem every greenback it has issued by paying dollar for dollar in gold for it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. When will that time come?

Mr. PIKE. I am trying every day to hasten that time. I tried the other day to bring the gentleman and his party up to the position of allowing the people of this country to make contracts payable in gold; but I cannot bring them up to it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I must resume the floor now. In regard to the right of the people of this country to make contracts payable in gold, I expressed my views at length the other evening; I took nearly five minutes to do so. I now assert what in substance I asserted then, that we have the right to pay off our debt exactly as we have agreed to pay it, and that we are under no obligation to pay it in any other way; and that it is no repudiation to pay it as we have agreed to pay it, I do not care whether the debtor thereby gets ten cents or one hundred cents on the dollar.

Now, if I understand the platform of the gentlemen upon the other side of this House, although I admit it is somewhat ambiguous and susceptible of two or three constructions, yet if it means anything in the view the gentleman from Maine has expressed, it means simply this: we have the right to pay our debts, the five-twenties as they are called, in greenbacks to-day or whenever they shall fall due. The only objection the gentleman from Maine makes to that is that we have not the greenbacks to pay. When the debt becomes due we are certainly under obligation to pay it; and being under obligation to pay it, we must either pay in the lawful money of the country, as it is now denominated, which means greenbacks, or we must pay in gold; and the gentleman tells us that we cannot pay in gold, because there is not gold enough in the country for that purpose. Now, I ask whether there are any more greenbacks in the country than there is of gold. If there is any force in the gentleman's argument that we cannot pay the debt of the country in greenbacks, because there are not enough greenbacks to pay it, then I ask how are we to accomplish the payment of the debt in gold, when there is less gold in the country than there are greenbacks? If the gentleman will tell us how we can pay gold under such circumstances I shall be very glad to hear him.

Mr. PIKE. I will answer the gentleman; and I trust that then he will answer my question. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the debt is to be paid gradually, if at all.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes; I guess that is so.

Mr. PIKE. I have no doubt of it. We have no real surplus in the Treasury now; for we have floating obligations to meet which will require every dollar now in the Treasury that can be spared; and this money should be applied for that purpose without touching one dollar of the funded debt. We have not in the Treasury to-day one dollar that can properly be applied to the payment of the funded debt. Now, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman has not answered the question I put to him.

Mr. PIKE. The gentleman says he is in favor of issuing greenbacks for the purpose of substituting them for the national bank notes. Is he in favor further of issuing greenbacks, according to the Pendletonian plan, for the purpose of paying the public creditors?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, as to the Pendletonian plan, the gentleman will excuse me from making any remark.

Mr. PIKE. Well, I withdraw that part of the question. Is he in favor of issuing greenbacks to pay the bonds?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. With regard to the other part of the question I will be more explicit than the gentleman has been in answering the question which I put to him.

Mr. PIKE. I want to know whether the gentleman is in favor of issuing greenbacks for any other purpose than for the purpose of taking up the notes of the national banks?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Now, as the gentleman has got his question revamped, I hope he will hold himself in reserve until I have answered it. [Laughter.] I answer, as I answered before, that in my judgment there is no necessity for issuing any additional amount of greenbacks, except to supply the place now supplied by the national bank currency. The banks now receive a premium for keeping the notes of the United States upon deposit. If you withdraw those you will be able to pay every dollar of your debt as it falls due without the issue of another dollar of greenbacks.

Mr. PIKE. In what way?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. By means of the greenbacks issued to supply the place of the national currency, for supplying which you now pay a premium to the banks.

Mr. PIKE. What will you give the banks in place of those notes?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I ask, in the name of common sense, what useful purpose is subserved, and how is the country benefited, by depositing our bonds or our bills, or our three per cent. notes, with the banks and allowing them to issue currency which circulates throughout the country, we paying the interest on those bonds, and at the same time paying six per cent. upon our national indebtedness? No man has ever given a reasonable answer to this question. The gentleman from Maine will not answer it. He seems to want to put questions to me, to see whether he cannot create some sort of suspicion that there is not integrity or honesty in the position I have taken. Now, I say to that gentleman that we can adopt the method I have indicated without any sort of difficulty. Now, I put the question back to him—is he in favor of withdrawing the national currency, so called, and supplying its place with the greenbacks of the country?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. I trust I may be allowed to answer that question?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Maine must appeal to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield any further?

Mr. SCHENCK. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. How much does he want?

Mr. RANDALL. Five minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will yield to the gentleman for five minutes; but is he willing to first let the gentleman from Maine have two minutes?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. PIKE. I only want two minutes for the purpose of replying to the gentleman from Wisconsin and showing how he would pay the national debt. He says the banks have $300,000,000 of national notes. He says he would take up those $300,000,000 of national notes and substitute for them "greenbacks," and in that way we would pay $300,000,000 of public debt. But having paid the national bank notes with greenbacks how is he to pay bonds with them too?

Mr. ROSS. We do not owe the banks those notes.

Mr. PIKE. Is he going to rob the banks of $300,000,000?

Mr. ROSS. They are a gratuity.

Mr. PIKE. Unless he does so he is compelled to send out this new issue and put it in the vaults of the banks. Having taken the $300,000,000 of national notes and destroyed them and put in the vaults of the banks the $300,000,000 of greenbacks in the place of the notes destroyed, how is he to pay then with them a single dollar of the public debt?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. PIKE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. When the "greenbacks" have passed into the national banks in place of their present currency, they will pass out and from hand to hand. When the gentleman talks about these "greenbacks" being destroyed, as valueless, as never becoming a medium of circulation, he should remember that when they take the place of the national bank notes they will pass out among the people. Why does the gentleman talk as though these "greenbacks," when we substitute them for national bank notes, are destroyed? By that substitution we will also save $20,000,000 of interest.

Mr. PIKE. When they pass out of the Treasury they do not pass among the people, but they pass to the banks in exchange for the $300,000,000 of national bank notes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Do not the banks owe debts, and have they not to circulate these "greenbacks"?

Mr. PIKE. When the banks take our greenbacks in place of their notes they do as they please; but we do not use the same money to pay the national creditor. The creditor will still hold his bonds. The gentleman's plan ought to be considered "a new way to pay old debts," and a very poor one.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, although I did not intend to I will endeavor to answer the question of the gentleman from Maine as the way I would pay the public debt, which is by withdrawing the national currency and substituting "greenbacks." It is simply this, and it is the same scheme as that of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] when he proposes the establishment of a sinking fund. I would withdraw the national bank notes from the banks, and with the "greenbacks" issued in their place I would buy the $300,000,000 bonds owned by the banks and deposited in the Treasury to secure their circulation and dedicate the bonds as a sinking fund, and in thirty-five years I would pay the national debt without issuing another bond. That is an answer to the question of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PIKE. To whom do those bonds belong?

Mr. RANDALL. They belong to the banks. I would substitute for them "greenbacks," the people's money, and not the paper of these private corporations.

Mr. PIKE. How will you get your "greenbacks"?

Mr. RANDALL. By enactment.

Mr. PIKE. By a new issue?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. PIKE. Does not the act of March, 1864, limit the issue to $400,000,000?

Mr. RANDALL. I am ready to argue at the proper time that there is no contract between the banks and the Government that the banks should have this gratuity for all time.

Mr. PIKE. That is what I was trying to get from the gentleman from Wisconsin. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is in favor of a new issue to pay the public debt. That I am opposed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did say I was in favor of issuing greenbacks to supply the place of the national bank currency. I said it over and over again.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not increase the circulation one dollar. I do not produce inflation. I do not raise the price of commodities in any particular. I simply relieve the people of the country from $18,000,000 of taxes each year. I think I have fully stated my proposition, and have to my mind satisfactorily answered the question of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

However, that is rather off the point I intended to speak to. The question of funding the debt at this time in my opinion is an inopportune one, and I will briefly state the reasons which will guide me in voting as I shall hereafter, if the proposition is made, for a postponement of this subject till the next session. We have not time at this late day of the session freely and fully to discuss the question in all its multifarious shapes and aspects. Neither is the market, I may say, in that condition which warrants this Government at this time in making any attempt to fund its debt. But I will say if I am obliged to vote on the proposition before the House I much prefer the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means. I prefer it simply in a business point of view. The gentleman from Massachusetts proposes to issue three descriptions of bonds, a portion at five per cent., a portion at four and a half, and a third part at three and sixty-five hundredths per cent., whereas after due and full deliberation the Committee of Ways and Means inform us that they believe it is feasible to throw our securities upon the market at three and sixty-five hundredths. Now, there is no merchant or business man in the country who will not issue his note for three and sixty-five hundredths in preference to four or five per cent.

There is another objectionable feature in the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL,] in my opinion. I am opposed now and for all time to this country catering to foreign capital in any manner whatever. Why cannot these people pay the expense of transporting the gold, the interest upon these bonds, as well as this Government? Why should the Government pay for transporting it abroad? Why do foreigners come here and take our bonds? Simply because they can make more money out of them than by investing in other bonds at home. Now let us begin and make this country the money center of the world. It is fast moving in this direction, and, sir, no vote of mine here shall be given giving it a contrary direction.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield ten minutes to my colleague.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is much in the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] that I cordially approve; and some of its leading features I hope will be adopted by rejecting the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means to the first section, and preserve the Senate provision which gives us three periods in which our debt shall mature, rather than one, as in the amendment of the committee.

Before I speak generally to the bill in its present condition, I desire to call attention for a moment to that feature. I am aware that there are advantages, as my colleague, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, suggests, in having the debt in one form and the bonds of one tenor; but after all it is rather an advantage that belongs to book-keeping than any real fiscal advantage to the Government itself. It was our policy during the war, and it seems to me a wise policy, to put our debt into a variety of forms, and that policy was adopted for two reasons: first, because some people like one form of security better than another; and in the next place, because we would be able to meet our obligations in that case more easily than if they all fell due at once. Some would like to take a bond that runs twenty years. He has a child a year old for which he wants to make provision, and he desires to buy a bond that will mature about the time the child is of age. There is a reason with him for wanting a bond of that peculiar character. Another man perhaps who wants to make a donation to some benevolent institution and desires to put it into the longest possible bond. And if we had some perpetual annuities, some interminable bonds, not a great amount, at a low rate of interest, I have no doubt they would be desirable and would find takers in this country. For these reasons, therefore, it was found desirable to have bonds of different descriptions so as to meet the popular wants, and for the still stronger reason that the debt might fall due at successive periods so that we could fund it or pay it gradually. I therefore regard the clause that was stricken out in the first section of the bill as it came from the Senate as far better than the amendment offered by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Now, consider another fact. Suppose that all our debt now funded were to fall due in five years or three years from this time, and we should be compelled to pay or to loan $2,100,000,000 in one year. We would be forced by inexorable necessity to make a loan, and every lender would take advantage of our situation and demand the hardest possible terms. But what will be the situation of this country forty years hence? Forty years from now we shall have, at the present rate of increase, a population of one hundred and thirty-five millions. Forty years from now, if our national wealth increases at the rate it has been increasing for the last fifty years, we shall be worth far more per capita in this country than we are worth now, and the population multiplied by the wealth per capita will show an enormous total of wealth. I made a calculation not long since which brought out this result: if we should hold our taxation in this country at the rate it bore in 1866, and allow that the ordinary expenditure of the Government should increase at no greater rate than they have averaged generally in time of peace, in twenty-one years the last dollar of our debt would be paid. This calculation is conclusive against this forty years' plan. We do not, of course, propose to do so, but if we should hold our taxes at the rate they were in 1866, in twenty-one years from now every dollar of our debt would be paid. I am, therefore, opposed to tying the nation down to one long term, and allowing $2,100,000,000 of debt to fall upon us with its whole weight in one year. It is better that each decade shall bear its share of burdens and responsibilities.

I hope the House will disagree to the amendments of the Committee of the Whole, and leave the three terms twenty, thirty, and forty years, as they came from the Senate.

Let me make still another suggestion. If we pass the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts we shall have no chance of getting the bill through within any reasonable time, and it is doubtful whether we can get it through at all. It is a new plan. It is not the Senate plan, and it is really no part of the Senate plan. It would be difficult for a conference committee to make up a report as between the two. Whereas if we pass the bill in something the same shape as it came from the Senate the conference committee can arrange matters of detail and we can get a bill through.

If the substitute of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] should be adopted, one or two features of which are entirely unlike anything that is in the Senate bill, it is probable that we shall get no bill at all. For instance, the gentleman has added a new sinking-fund system, and though I do not see precisely the extent to which that system goes, yet, if it be what I understand it to be, it is a repetition of an old, and he will permit me to say, an exploded system. If anybody expects that by any trick of logarithms or compound interest the payment of the public debt can be reached will find himself disappointed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am not in any way responsible for that system. The gentleman himself argues, I think, that there should be a funding system for the payment of the public debt.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection whatever to a sinking funding system, if it amounts simply to this: to putting a provision in the law which Congress shall make a covenant to save an annual surplus of the revenue to be applied to the redemption of the public debt; that is all. And the only thing that any Legislature can do honestly to reduce the public debt, is simply to levy such a tax that there will be a surplus over and above the annual expenditures to be applied to the redemption of the debt. From a hasty reading it appears to me that the gentleman's amendment goes further than this.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the House will adhere to the bill in the main as it came from the Senate. But I most earnestly desire that we shall not agree to the amendment made in the first section, on the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, which strikes out the three terms.

Now, let me say one word on another topic, and I shall conclude my remarks. On this question of paying the five-twenty bonds in greenbacks I have no concealment to make of my opinions. I am ready, for my part, to answer any of the direct questions that have been propounded here this morning. In the first place, it is worse than absurd for any one member or set of members to claim that they love the people and their interests above all others, and that they alone desire to lighten the burdens of taxation. This is a question of obligation to pay, and not a question of making burdens light or heavy. Now, I believe that when the first laws authorizing the five-twenty bonds were passed Congress intended that every dollar of them should be paid in gold. And I do not believe that any member of either House of Congress in 1862 or 1863 dreamed of paying them in any other way. I remember very well the first time that it was hinted to me that anybody thought otherwise. It was in 1864 or 1865, I forget now which; it was late in 1864 or early in 1865, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] intimated one day in this House that these bonds might be paid in greenbacks; and I remember that the statement struck the House with surprise and amazement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] will allow me two minutes more to finish the statement I am making.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say, however, that it seems to me that this whole greenback five-twenty bond question has reached a position of importance entirely beyond what it deserves to have.

Mr. PIKE. Allow me to say that I was a member of the Congress that passed that law, and I disagree with the gentleman entirely as to the payment in gold.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I was a member of that Congress, and I agree with the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. ELIOT. I was here at that time, and I heard not one word said in regard to anything different from what has been stated by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I was not here; but it is very plain what the law means.

Mr. GARFIELD. Nothing but my respect for the age and sympathy for the bodily feebleness of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] restrained me from reading what I held in my hand at the very moment he made his remarkable speech the other day, the record of his speech in 1862, on the passage of the first law authorizing five-twenty bonds, in which he declared in unequivocal terms that those bonds, both principal and interest, were payable in gold. Those remarks are on record, and if time allowed me I would read them. I quote this sentence as a sample. In showing that the five-twenties would be a valuable bond Mr. STEVENS said:

"A dollar in a miser's safe, unproductive, is a sore disturbance. Where could they invest it? In United States loans at six per cent., redeemable in gold in twenty years, the best and most valuable permanent investment that could be desired."

I have no doubt that he then represented the spirit and meaning of the law. I have already said that the controversy about these bonds is after all a war of words. How stands the case? What is the real question involved in the controversy? Everybody admits, I believe, that the interest on the five-twenty bonds is payable in gold. As to the currency in which the principal is payable there are but two opinions. Some say it is payable in gold; others say it is payable in greenbacks. Now, I do not think any man in this House ever has denied or ever will deny that the greenbacks are themselves payable in gold; so that it comes at last to this: we all agree that the interest of the five-twenty bonds is payable in gold; and we all agree that the principal of the five-twenty bonds is either payable directly in gold, or payable in something which is itself payable in gold. And that is the whole controversy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the second report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 352) authorizing the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Frances T. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson;

An act (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Martha Ann Wallace;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 354) admitting steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1863; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 343) to admit free of duty certain statuary.

MARY ANN WARD.

Mr. SAWYER, by unanimous consent, withdrew from the files of the House the pension papers in the case of Mary Ann Ward without leaving copies, the petition having been rejected.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged question, and present the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending 30th June, 1869.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending the 30th of June, 1869, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 5, 9, 10, 11, 24, 26, 29, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 40, 44, 45, 47, 50, 51, 60, 62, 63, 66, 67, 69, 71, 72, 73, 75, 76, 77, 78, 82, 104, 106, 109, 114, 120, 121, 123, 124, 125, 127, 128, 132, 133, 137, 139, 141, 142, 143, 148, 149, 150, 156, 158, 170, 172, 174, 175, 184, and 186.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 38, 39, 46, 48, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 61, 64, 65, 68, 70, 71, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 89, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 105, 108, 110, 113, 115, 116, 117, 126, 129, 130, 131, 134, 135, 138, 140, 145, 156, 161, 162, 168, 169, 171, 176, 180, 181, 182, 183, 185, and 188, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out in line two of said amendment the word "sixteen" and insert in lieu the word "thirteen;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "twenty-five hundred" and insert in lieu the words "twelve hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twelfth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment "thirty-six thousand five hundred" and insert in lieu "twenty-five thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the following words: "for the Bois Fort band;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the following words: for the "Bois Fort band;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line five of said amendment strike out the word "fifteen," and insert in lieu the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-first and forty-second amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendments and insert in lieu of both amendments the following words: "To enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to complete the removal of the scattering bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota to their reservations near White Earth lake, and to subsidize them thereat for the period of six months, this amount is hereby appropriated which, added to the unexpended balance of any appropriation heretofore made for the same purpose, will enable said Commissioner to pay to each member of such bands the sum of ten dollars in money, and twenty dollars in rations, such as are furnished the Army of the United States; such payment and delivery to be made only to such individuals of the bands as shall remove themselves to their reservations prior to the 1st day of December next, $40,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line four of said amendment strike out the word "ten," and insert in lieu the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "five," and insert in lieu the word "four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "six thousand seven hundred," and insert in lieu the words "five thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventy-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "four," and insert in lieu the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "seven thousand six," and insert in lieu "five thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line nine of said amendment strike out the word "four," and insert in lieu the word "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninetieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "nine hundred," and insert in lieu "seven hundred and twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninety-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "nine hundred," and insert in lieu "seven hundred and twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendments: after the word "cents," in line fifteen of said amendment, insert the following words: "or so much thereof as may be necessary," and strike out all after the word "sell," in line twenty-one of said amendment, down to and including the word "treaties," in line twenty-five, and insert in lieu the following words: "six hundred twenty-one hundred and eightieth parts of the several classes of bonds held by him in trust for said Pottawatomic Indians, and pay the proceeds thereof without any deduction in compliance with the provisions of said treaties;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and eleventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the words "four thousand six," and insert in lieu "three thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and twelfth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words: "which amount shall be deducted from any money or funds belonging to said tribe of Indians."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and eighteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line seven of said amendment strike out the words "twenty-five," insert in lieu the word "fifteen," and at the end of said amendment add the following words: "to be expended under the direction of Rev. H. B. Whipple, of Faribault, in the State of Minnesota;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and nineteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: in line four of said amendment strike out the word "fifty," and insert the word "thirty;" and after the word "dollars," in the same line, insert the following words: "to be expended under the direction of Rev. H. B. Whipple, of Faribault, in the State of Minnesota;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and twenty-second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in line two of said amendment strike out the words: "four thousand six" and insert in lieu "three thousand five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and thirty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "seventy" and insert in lieu the word "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-fourth amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "fifty," and insert in lieu the word "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and forty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out of said amendment the word "twenty," and insert in lieu the word "five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fifty-first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out of said amendment the words "fifty-five," and insert in lieu the word "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 152, 153, 154, and 155, and agree to the same, with the following amendments: strike out all of said four amendments, and strike out also lines twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five, and twenty-six of the bill on page 54, and insert in lieu the following words: "For pay of one physician, $1,200; one blacksmith, $750; one assistant blacksmith, $500; one farmer, $720; one teacher, $750; and one carpenter, $720, upon each of the reservations in California; and one miller at $750, upon each of the Round Valley and Hoopa Valley reservations;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fifty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in line six of said amendment strike out the word "fifty," and insert in lieu the word "twenty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and fifty-ninth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with amendments as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "five thousand" and insert in lieu the words "three thousand five hundred," and at the end of said amendment add the following words: "and the Smith river reservation is hereby discontinued;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixtieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: strike out all of said amendment, and substitute in lieu thereof the following: "for amount of deficiency expended in subsisting the Navajos at the Bosque Redondo, according to the contract made by Theodore H. Dodd, from the 22d of May, 1863, until their removal to their old homes, $21,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary at eleven cents per ration;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and sixty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with amendments as follows: in line four of said amendment, after the word "dollars," insert the following words: "to be expended under the direction of Lieutenant General Sherman, of the Indian peace commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 164, 165, 166, and 167, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: strike out all of said four amendments, and insert in lieu the following words: "for constructing warehouse, agency building, blacksmith and carpenter's shop, and school-house, per article three of said treaty, $12,500, to be expended under the direction of Lieutenant General Sherman, of the Indian peace commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and seventy-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "eighty-five," and insert in lieu the word "fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the one hundred and seventy-seventh, one hundred and seventy-eighth, and one hundred and seventy-ninth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: strike out all of said three amendments and insert in lieu of said amendments the following words: "For this amount for the purpose of carrying out the treaty stipulations, making and preparing homes, furnishing provisions, tools, and farming utensils, and furnishing food for such bands of Indians with which treaties have been made by the Indian peace commission and not yet ratified, and defraying the expenses of the commission in making such treaties and carrying their provisions into effect, $500,000, to be expended under the direction of Lieutenant General Sherman, of said commission, and drawn from the Treasury upon his requisition upon the Secretary of the Interior;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 187, and agree to the same, with amendments as follows: strike out of said amendment all after the word "acre," in line eight, down to and including the word "office," in line thirteen, and at the end of said amendment add the following: "Provided further, That all improvements made by any persons on said reservation before the passage of this act shall be the sole property of the person making them, who shall have priority of purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land covering and adjoining said improvements, and all said lands shall be sold and disposed of for money only;" and the Senate agree to the same.

TIMOTHY O. HOWE,
J. B. HENDERSON,
L. M. MORRILL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
BENJAMIN F. BUTLER,
W. WINDOM,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to hear some explanation of this report from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, there are but one or two matters to which I think it will be necessary to call the attention of the House. The bill as it went from the House was amended in the Senate by inserting quite a number of provisions making appropriations to carry out, as was supposed, existing treaties. In every case where the ordinary appropriations to carry out existing treaties were found to be required by positive law the House agreed to the Senate amendments.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state what those treaties are?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I say that wherever the ordinary appropriations for the payment of annuities to Indians, and for meeting the ordinary expenses of the Indian service under the custom of the Indian department, were required by existing law, the amendments of the Senate have been agreed to. Wherever any discretion was left to Congress, and where the House bill appropriated less money than was proposed to be appropriated in the Senate amendments or in the estimates of the Interior Department, there as a rule, the Senate recedes, so as to leave the bill with reference to these matters very nearly as it left the House, except in cases where there were evidently mistakes. Thus a very great number of amendments were settled upon an examination of the law. Then the Senate had made quite a number of large appropriations, and there are two classes of these to which I wish to call the attention of the House.

The first important item is an appropriation of $350,000, to be expended under the direction of the Lieutenant General of the Army, in bringing in hostile tribes and putting them upon reservations under treaties and stipulations, as they are sometimes not treaties, made by the peace commissioners. A very large discretion has been given to the Lieutenant General in using that fund. He appeared before the conference committee by letter and two members of the peace commission in person, and they assured us that by the use of these funds to the amount of $350,000, in addition to $150,000 already appropriated, various hostile tribes will be put out of the way, and that some five or six million dollars will be saved in the expenses of the Army. We appropriate $370,000 instead of certain specific appropriations, as in the Senate amendments.

Then there is another case where a very large appropriation was necessary to be made. The Navajo Indians were removed by a United States officer some four years ago to a reservation known as the Bosque Redondo, the Round Grove, where they had nothing to live on, where they could not raise anything, but where they were kept as prisoners of war and fed by the Army until last November, at an expense of some eight hundred thousand dollars a year. Some say the expense was much larger, but that I think may be regarded as a fair statement. The Indian peace commission have removed those Indians back to their own country, where they have tilled fields, fruit trees, and other means of living. In taking them back to their homes it becomes necessary to build huts and proper storehouses and other buildings, and to give them farming utensils and cattle, and we appropriate $200,000 for that purpose. We also agree to pay an annuity of five dollars a head to these Indians for this year and for two years longer, although we have appropriated only for this year, to set them up in housekeeping as it were. We appropriate three hundred and twenty thousand dollars and odd to take care of these seventy-two hundred Indians and to restore to them what we have taken from them. To my mind the plan will be successful, and it will be a clear saving to the Treasury.

Mr. WARD. What is the amount of that appropriation?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. About three hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. WARD. For this single tribe?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. For this single tribe of seventy-two hundred Indians.

Mr. WARD. What was the original appropriation as it went from the House?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. One hundred thousand dollars for feeding them, to the man who was feeding them where they were. By this we restore them to their homes, where they are hereafter to be self-sustaining. As I have already said the Army fed them until last November, and fed them at a ration which cost twenty-four cents. Congress having appropriated $100,000 toward feeding them, they were fed at eighteen cents a ration by a contract with the Indian Bureau, costing about twenty-one thousand dollars a month to the Government. That appropriation was exhausted and $80,000 had to be taken from another appropriation, they being where they could not raise anything for themselves and being prisoners of war. Finding the appropriation was exhausted, the contractor refused to go on with his contract, and the Indian peace commission found that the contract under which he had been feeding them at eighteen cents the ration was being executed by a sub-contractor at eleven cents, leaving to the contractor a clear profit of $560 a day, and that without having anything to do except to draw the money. The peace commission made a contract at eleven cents until they get to their homes. Then they will not want any more feeding by the Government.

There has been an amendment in the Senate of $120,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the purpose of carrying out that contract. We put in enough at eleven cents a ration to feed them until they get to their new homes. With the exception of these two large appropriations there is substantially no other great case in this appropriation bill. Otherwise the principle of the House has been carried out.

Mr. CLEVER. I would inquire of the gentleman in regard to the appropriation for the contract for feeding the Navajo Indians in New Mexico. How do you intend to pay it?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am very glad to answer the gentleman's inquiry. The Delegate from New Mexico asks me how we intend to pay it. I for one never intend to pay it. At eleven cents a ration it would come to about one hundred and thirty-eight thousand dollars. I do not mean to be held to the exact figures. But there has been paid on that contract $180,000, leaving already about forty thousand dollars profit. By my vote the contractors never shall get any more.

Mr. CLEVER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. CLEVER. I think the gentleman is making progress in the doctrine of repudiation. Now, sir, there are $120,000 due to the people of New Mexico for feeding the Navajo Indians. It is true contracts were made by the Indian Bureau with certain parties—I do not remember their names—to feed these Indians; but the provisions, the cattle, the flour, the salt, and everything, were purchased upon the credit of the Government from the people of New Mexico. Now there are on file in the Interior Department the vouchers showing that these supplies were delivered by citizens of New Mexico to these contractors, but here the gentleman comes in and proposes to strike out all the appropriation because, he says, the contract price was too high. Now, sir, that is not the people's fault, but the fault of the agents who made the contract. I am satisfied that the supplies were delivered to these Indians. The contract was made by Colonel Dodd, one of the best Indian agents in the United States. But be that as it may, if the contract has been made, if the people of New Mexico have delivered these supplies, if the Government has had the benefit of them, is it right that this House should refuse to pay for them? You may just as well get up and say we are not bound to pay our national debt. I say we ought to pay every debt which is fairly incurred by ourselves or our agents. They have contracted to feed these Indians during a time when there were no appropriations available; $120,000 is the amount due, and I think some provision should be made to pay these men who have given their beef, their flour, their meal, and their food of various kinds for the subsistence of these Indians. Whether the gentleman likes the contractors or not, is not the question. The question is, is it an honest debt? I believe it is, and that Congress therefore is bound to pay it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will state, Mr. Speaker, a little at length now exactly all of this contract. One Elijah Scimerley, of Greenville, Tennessee, which is a town blessed once by the residence of our Chief Magistrate, undertook to feed the Indians on the Bosque Redondo in New Mexico. He had neither money nor credit. He sold out his contract before he had anything. He sold out three eights to C. B. Johnson, of Texas, three eights more to Perry Fuller, of Kansas, late of Washington city; one eighth he kept, and the other one eighth I have not been able to trace. Having done that, the parties carried on the contract a short time and then sold it to a man in New Mexico by the name of Patterson, a very respectable and reliable man, I am happy to say, for eleven cents a ration. The original parties were to receive nineteen cents a ration. Mr. Patterson had a very good thing of it at eleven cents, as the rations cost about eight cents each. Under that contract there was paid to Scimerley and his assignees $180,000 at nineteen cents a ration, whereas Patterson was willing to furnish the rations at eleven cents. Mr. Dodd, who I am happy to say also seems to be a very respectable gentleman so far as I could learn for an Indian agent, went into the business and made this contract to continue feeding the Indians, when, on the 22d day of May, after having received $180,000, and the money not coming in quite as fast as they wanted it, these contractors broke their contract and refused to feed the Indians any further. Therefore they notified the sub-contractor, Patterson, that they would not feed them any longer, and that he must not feed them. Therefore Mr. Dodd contracted to continue the feeding, keeping the price of the rations at eleven cents until the troops should come there and remove the Indians; so that we do not owe anything to these people in New Mexico. They have done nothing on the faith of the Government. There is not a man who has ever been a citizen of New Mexico, so far as I know, that had anything to do with this contract except Mr. Patterson, and he has his remedy against the men who employed him. I say again that $180,000 in cash have been taken out of the Treasury and paid to these contractors, when $138,000, or about that, would have paid all they ever ought to have had.

Now, there are gentlemen from Tennessee who know about this Mr. Scimerley, and I am informed—and if I do anybody injustice I will give my authority—I am informed by gentlemen who know him that Mr. Scimerley has been employed in buying up the debts of the Indian Commissioner, Mr. Taylor, at a discount since he took that contract. I do not know that those two things have anything to do with each other, but I apply the rule of the man who said he knew the miller's hogs were fat, but he did not know on whose corn they were fattened.

I have brought this matter to the attention of the House that the House may see the difficulties under which the Committee on Appropriations labored in regard to Indian affairs. This is the great item that we have struck out.

I have been asked whether the $1,800,000 under the Choctaw and Chickasaw treaty is in this bill. Upon examination the committee had no doubt of the justice of that claim; but as the House had refused to recognize or pass it when it was presented here, we did not feel authorized to put it in. We did, however, agree to an amendment of the Senate, that the Committees on Indian Affairs of the two Houses shall examine into the justice of the claim and report to Congress at its next session. That is all that has been done about that claim.

I now yield to my colleague on the committee of conference from Ohio, [Mr. VAN TRUMP.]

Mr. VAN TRUMP. While I agree in the main with all the provisions of this bill, and with nearly all the amendments that have been put upon it, both by the Senate and by the committee of conference, I have an objection to one of the amendments so strong that I could not bring my mind to indorse it by my signature to the report.

I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that all this money that is spent or appropriated outside of treaty stipulations is well appropriated in regard to those Indians with whom no treaties have been made, because every dollar, in my opinion, that is thus appropriated will save not only hundreds but thousands of dollars in avoiding subsequent difficulties with the Indians unless these appropriations are made.

But my objection is to the fifty-ninth amendment, and I will thank the Clerk to read it, so that the House may understand it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For expenses of taking a census and investigating claims of loyal Creek refugees and freedmen as per article four of the treaty of June 14, 1866, $200,000: Provided, That no money herein appropriated to the Creek tribe of Indians shall be paid to them until such Creeks as may have been properly enrolled by the Creek agent previous to the 14th day of March A. D. 1867, and who were refused any share in the money then distributed per capita, under orders from Louis V. Boggy, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, for the reason that said persons were of African descent, shall first be paid therefrom a per capita dividend equal to that to which they were entitled on said payment of March 14, 1867, and equal to that paid to all Creek citizens at that time.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not oppose this appropriation because they are freedmen belonging to the Creek nation, formerly their slaves. Nor do I believe for a moment that gentlemen on the other side have allowed the appropriation because of any feeling in favor of freedmen. The whole question depends upon the construction of the treaty between the United States and the Creek Indians under date of the 14th of March, 1866. Allow me to premise by saying that these Creeks were situated upon lands, the title to which in them was of a peculiar character. They were in effect a sort of communists. In other words, the lands upon which this Creek nation resided were held in common by all the Creek nation, so far as the mere question of title is concerned. And yet each Creek Indian who held a farm by occupancy held it by a title as perfectly paramount to the original nation title as though he had a perfect title in himself.

On the 14th of June, 1866, the United States entered into a treaty with these Indians, they having been in rebellion. As a result of that treaty the United States purchased of these Creek Indians the western half of their entire possessions, amounting to some three or four million acres. The true solution of this question depends upon the construction of that treaty, in regard to the right of these freedmen, formerly and prior to the rebellion slaves to these Creek Indians, I will read the second article of the treaty:

"The Creeks hereby covenant and agree that henceforth neither slavery nor involuntary servitude otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted in accordance with laws applicable to all members of said tribes, shall ever exist in said nation; and inasmuch as there are among the Creeks many persons of African descent who have no interest in the soil—

That is the point; it is declared here by the treaty between the United States and these Creek Indians that these freedmen, formerly slaves to these Indians, had no interest in the soil upon which these Indians were located—

"Inasmuch as there are among the Creeks many persons of African descent who have no interest in the soil, it is stipulated that hereafter those persons lawfully residing in said Creek country under their laws and usages, or who have been residing in said Creek country, and may return within one year from the ratification of this treaty, and their descendants, and others of the same race as may be permitted by the laws of said nation to settle within the limits of the jurisdiction of the Creek nation as descendants thereof, shall have and enjoy all the rights and privileges of native citizens, including an equal interest in the soil and national funds, and the laws of said nation shall be equally binding upon and give equal protection to all of such persons, and all others, of whatever race or color, who may be adopted as citizens or members of said tribe."

Now it is here declared that, in relation to this one half of these Indian lands, which they were then selling to the United States under this treaty, these freedmen had no interest at all. It is provided, I admit, that in regard to the other half of the lands retained by the Creek Indians these freedmen should thereafter have a common interest with the Creek Indians proper. Now what further does this treaty provide?

"In compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon, the Creeks hereby cede and convey to the United States to be sold to and used as homes for such other civilized Indians as the United States may choose to settle thereon, the west half of their entire domain, to be divided by a line running north and south; the eastern half of said Creek lands being retained by them shall, except as herein otherwise stipulated, be forever set apart as a home for said Creek nation; and in consideration of said cession of the west half of their lands, estimated to contain three million two hundred and fifty thousand five hundred and sixty acres, the United States agree to pay the sum of thirty cents per acre, amounting to $975,108, in the manner hereinafter provided, to wit: $200,000 shall be paid per capita in money, unless otherwise directed by the President of the United States, upon the ratification of this treaty, to enable the Creeks to occupy, restore, and improve their farms, and to make their nation independent and self-sustaining, and to pay the damages sustained by the mission schools on the North Fork and the Arkansas rivers." &c.

Now, this question arose before the Interior Department when the Creeks came to get this $200,000; and these freedmen were also represented there. I believe Mr. Boggy was the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The question was raised between these freedmen and the Creek Indians proper as to whether under the stipulations of this treaty these freedmen were interested in this sum of $200,000. It was maintained by the attorney of the Creeks before the Commissioner that this $200,000 in the first place was not a national fund as contemplated by the treaty, but a specific fund, to go to certain Creeks, and not to all of them; to certain Creeks who held farms by the title of occupancy, in order to enable them to repair the injury done to those farms, &c. The judgment of the Commissioner was that this $200,000 was a payment for a specific purpose, to be paid to a portion of the Creeks only, such as were actual occupants of farms in that portion of the Territory, and consequently he directed that it should be paid over to those Creek Indians, the freedmen being excluded. That, Mr. Speaker, was a judicial proceeding, so far at least as that department acted in a judicial capacity, as all the Executive Departments must act more or less when such questions are presented to them. The question now is whether we, as a Legislature, shall assume judicial powers and undertake by this bill to adjudicate the relative claims of these Creeks proper, and these freedmen who claim a participation in this fund. The effect of this amendment is that these freedmen shall be recompensed, not out of this $200,000, for that is already exhausted, but out of any money owing by the United States to the Creek Indians, the payment to these freedmen being made before any other payment.

This, Mr. Speaker, is simply a question of construction, about which my colleagues on the committee and myself have differed. It is a question which was more debated than perhaps any other question that came before the committee; and one of the distinguished Senators who was a member of the committee acknowledged that my presentation of the case had staggered his opinion, although he voted against me.

Now, it is observable, Mr. Speaker, that in the section appropriating this $200,000 the word "freedmen" is not used, while in the other provisions made by the treaty for the freedmen they are designated as freedmen, in contradistinction from the Creeks proper. I have been solemnly impressed with the wrong which the amendment recommended by the report will inflict upon these Creek Indians. My firm conviction is that, sitting here as a Legislature, we have no jurisdiction to adjust this judicial question, and that it is wrong to introduce it into this bill. Everything else embraced in this report has met my hearty concurrence; but in consequence of my difference on this point with my colleagues upon the committee, I have been conscientiously constrained to withhold my signature from the report. I am not an enemy to the bill. If it be passed with this amendment, so be it. I have felt it my duty to bring to the attention of the House the facts of the case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make a statement of this matter, because it raises in one view of it a pretty interesting question. I wish, in the first place, to bear testimony to the faithfulness with which my colleague, on the committee the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VAN TRUMP,] has aided the committee by his constant attendance and his careful examination of every question affecting the economy and prosperity of the administration of Indian affairs. We differed upon only this one question substantially, and this difference arose, perhaps, as a matter of necessity; for as the negro comes into this question, I could not expect the gentleman to agree with me. [Laughter.]

The Creeks owned a large tract of land by a title a little stronger than a mere possessory title, by which the Indians held most of their lands. They also owned slaves, negro slaves, on that land. The Creeks went into the rebellion. They forfeited to the United States their lands and their slaves. The United States, however, condoning the offenses of these red rebels, as it condoned the crimes of the white rebels, went into an arrangement with the Creeks. A treaty was made, the first article of which conceded to the United States one half of the Creek lands, on which we might put other Indians; and the United States agreed to pay to the Creeks $975,000 in this form: $200,000 to be distributed per capita one year; $400,000 the next year; $100,000 to the loyal Creeks to pay for losses; and $275,000 to go into a school fund.

The Creeks sold by this treaty just one half of this land. When they made the treaty, however, they provided for all of their slaves, calling them "Creeks of African descent." They might as well, many of them, have been described as Africans of Creek descent. They provided for them all in this way. By this article they said, inasmuch as there is among the Creeks many persons of African descent who have no interest in the soil, because as slaves they had no interest in the soil, now residing in the Creek country, they and all who may come in there, having been formerly residents, shall have and enjoy all rights and privileges of native citizens, including an equal interest in the soil and the national fund. You will see by the same treaty they sold one half of their soil—the treaty in which they provided that the Creeks of African descent should have an equal interest in the soil.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. That is thereafter in the remaining soil?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is the whole question.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. The construction of the treaty was after the payment by the United States.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. These Creeks of African descent were to have the same interest in the soil and the national fund. It is a question whether this $200,000 does not belong to the national fund. But, sir, there is a question lying deeper than that, and that is this question, whether the African slave while he is a slave has any interest in the soil he inhabits.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. My position is this: this $200,000 is not part of the national fund as it does not apply to all the Creeks, but only to the occupants of farms.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The first great question is, has the African slave, when a slave, any interest in the soil he inhabits? I do not mean has he any proprietary interest in the soil, but has he the right to interfere when that soil comes to be set off to another country? That is the great question to which I wish to call the attention of the House. The Creeks have no property in severalty. They hold in common.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. They hold a common interest in the title subject to individual occupancy.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They hold a common interest in the soil. The title is in the Creek nation. No man owns this, that, or the other farm. In the annuities these Africans were represented as part of the families, and they received annuities in proportion to the number of Africans they had. This money was given to the Creeks by the United States for the purpose of restoring their farms and to enable them to become self-sustaining as a nation. This treaty made the Creeks of African descent a portion of the nation, and they could not be made a portion of that nation and be self-sustaining without a portion of that fund. By the treaty they have all the rights of native citizens. They have rights in the soil which could not be taken away. Even while slaves that right was recognized by giving them all the rights of native citizens in the soil and in the national fund.

Now, sir, a census was taken of these Creeks and a division of this money was ordered per capita. The question was raised by some of the rebel Creeks, who had not forgotten their hostility to the Africans, as to whether these African Creeks should be counted in, and Mr. Bogy, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, decided they should not be counted in and their portion should be distributed among the other Creeks. When it became necessary to appropriate $400,000 to carry out the treaty and to send down a commission to examine the claim of the loyal Creeks there, the Senate put on a proviso that there should be no more money paid to the Creeks until all the Creeks should have all the rights of native citizens in the soil and national fund. It says to them that they shall not exclude the "Creeks of African descent" from their share which it is necessary they should have to make them self-sustaining. We do not mean to take anything out of the Creeks at all. We do not think it was their fault. We think it was the fault of Mr. Bogy, the Commissioner, that this fund was not fairly distributed before, but at the next payment of installment upon this very land we propose that a fair, just, and honest division shall be made with the Creeks of African descent.

My colleague puts his objection upon the ground that the Creeks say in their treaty that the Africans had no interest in the soil. Ah, the Africans were not made parties to the treaty or they might have given it an entirely different construction. They said the Africans had no interest in the soil. Hereafter we say they shall have an equal interest with native citizens in the soil and in the national fund.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. If the Creeks said that those who were not parties to the treaty had no interest in the soil, that is an allegation that the United States, as a treaty-making party, should take no advantage of.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The difficulty was there was nobody representing the African. He was left out as he always has been heretofore in everything. But hereafter he is to have his share in the national fund. This money to be paid by the treaty is to be divided among all the citizens of the Creek nation.

One word further. Here is $275,000 put into the school fund. Would you provide—

Mr. VAN TRUMP. Understand me, I make no question in regard to any other fund except this specific sum of $200,000. All the other part is to be enjoyed in common by them.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I agree; but if your principle is good for this $200,000, it is good for the other $275,000, because the school fund is part of the same payment for the same men, and makes a part of the same fund.

Mr. VAN TRUMP. However, with the same stipulation in regard to repairs to the specific farms of certain Indians of the Creek nation—

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. As my friend puts the whole stress of his argument on that, I will read it. The provision of the treaty was this:

"Shall have and enjoy all the rights and privileges of native citizens, including an equal interest in the soil and national fund; and the laws of the United States shall be equally binding and give equal protection to all such persons, and all others of whatever race or color who may be adopted as citizens or members of said tribe."

Mr. VAN TRUMP. I have no doubt the gentleman has read it right. The only question is whether this specific fund for a specific purpose, which applies only to a portion of the Creeks, can be applied to the national fund in common to all?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The reason I call it a national fund is that it is to be appropriated to repairs and to the restoration of farms injured during the war, and to enable the nation to become self-sustaining. Now, I do not know any better definition of a national fund than a fund to enable a nation to become self-sustaining. I hold to that. My friend bases his argument on the first clause. I base mine on the second clause, which intends to make the Indians self-sustaining. But he agrees with me in regard to the division per capita, including those of African descent, so far as the other appropriations are concerned. I am able to say that every portion of the bill was discussed in committee as carefully as this has been, and that here was the only disagreement on the part of any member of the committee to the various amendments to the bill. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF LOUISIANA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, relative to the office of surveyor general of Louisiana and the archives of the office, and recommending an appropriation of $4,500 therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ELECTION IN MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from General Rawlings, chief of staff of the General of the Army, with a report from the commander of the fourth military district of the recent election in Mississippi for State constitution, &c.

The SPEAKER. The communication is quite bulky. Does the House desire to have it printed?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose the question of printing it had better be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope that part of it which relates to the election will be printed.

The SPEAKER. It appears all to relate to the election, although the Chair has not examined it very closely.

Mr. BROOKS. The Committee on Reconstruction have the subject of the Mississippi election before them, and may take some action upon it.

The SPEAKER. Ordering it to be printed at this stage of the session would delay action.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It could not be printed in season for use at this session.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the papers will all be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction with authority to have them printed if they desire. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments; when the Speaker signed the same.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is now so late that I hope the House will agree to meet at half past seven o'clock this evening to go on with the funding bill.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not think it is any use. The Senate will not agree to adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt we can adjourn this week if we finish this bill early.

Mr. SCHENCK. By way of testing the question, I move that there be a meeting this evening for business at half past seven o'clock.

Mr. BROOKS. To take up what subject?

Mr. SCHENCK. The funding bill will be the first thing in order.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion; and it was agreed to—ayes eighty-one, noes not counted.

RELIEF FROM DISABILITY.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to report from the Committee of Elections a bill to relieve Simeon Corley, one of the Representatives-elect from South Carolina from disability, with a view to putting it on its passage.

The SPEAKER. That will require a vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object to the introduction of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has withdrawn it.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL OFFICE-HOLDING.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be hereby instructed to report to this House, without delay a bill providing proper penalties to be adjudged against any person who holds or attempts to hold any office in violation of the provisions of the fourteenth article of the Constitution of the United States or who shall exercise any of the functions or receive any of the perquisites of such office.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till half past seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

C. HANSEN.

Mr. BROOKS, by unanimous consent, presented the petition of C. Hansen, for protection as to a contract for a canal across the Isthmus of Holstein; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, a citizen of the United States, in behalf of himself and of a company formed in the United States for the purpose of opening a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Holstein, begs leave to represent that on application to the Government of the kingdom of Denmark the canal company received on the 9th of October, 1860, from the royal ministry for the duchess of Holstein and Lauenburg, a concession for the survey of the canal, in accordance wherewith the company expended large sums of money in making the preliminary surveys and was prepared to enter upon the execution of the work, but was prevented by the war undertaken by the kingdom of Prussia and the empire of Austria against the kingdom of Denmark.

By the treaty of peace subsequently made between the kingdom of Prussia and the kingdom of Denmark, by which Prussia acquired the territory through which the canal was to run, it is provided in the seventeenth article thereof, that all concessions, grants, and contracts made by the kingdom of Denmark, shall be observed and ratified by the kingdom of Prussia.

The undersigned, on behalf of himself and the company which he represents, has under that section of the treaty applied to the royal Government of Prussia for permission to carry out the concession to the company, and to execute this important commercial work. All his efforts to that end have, however, proved fruitless, and he is now compelled to appeal to his own Government, through the House of Representatives, to assert and protect his rights.

He therefore humbly solicits that the House of Representatives shall make inquiries into the facts which he is prepared to substantiate, and that it will enact a law of Congress, directing the Secretary of State to demand and procure proper indemnification to him, and authorizing the President of the United States, in case such indemnification is refused, to take measures to enforce it.

C. HANSEN, of New York.
WASHINGTON CITY, July 19, 1868.

TAX ON MANUFACTURERS.

Mr. BROOKS also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1927) to amend an act entitled "An act to exempt certain manufacturers from internal tax, and for other purposes," approved March 31, 1868.

Mr. BROOKS. As it is too late to act on the bill at this session, I move that it be re-committed to the Committee of Ways and Means and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have a little pension bill here, to which I suppose there will be no objection. I ask that it may be now considered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I object. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I object.

Mr. RANDALL. To what?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. To any other business than the regular order.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have agreed to yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have a bill here which was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. I have been directed by that committee to report the bill to the House with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I suppose there will be no objection to it. The bill is House bill No. 443, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to refund to the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company certain penalties wrongfully collected.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the substitute be read.

The substitute was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to examine a judgment by confession rendered on the 2d day of October, 1865, in the circuit court of the northern district of Illinois, against the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company, for $5,500 penalties for certain alleged violation of the internal revenue laws, and to refund to the company so much of the amount paid into the Treasury of the United States as upon investigation he may think it right and proper under the circumstances of the case to remit.

Mr. MAYNARD. The law would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to do what this substitute authorizes, except for the fact that this money has already been covered into the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object to anything but the regular order of business.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well; I have no interest in the bill. It is one introduced by the gentleman's own colleague, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, upon which Mr. SCHENCK was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL.]

Mr. MARSHALL submitted some remarks. [See Appendix.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BENTON.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, notifying the House that that body had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1341) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

It also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post roads, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I submit the following conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. 1341) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows: That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered ten, nineteen, twenty-one, and twenty-two.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered one, two, three, four, five, six, eight, nine, fourteen, sixteen, seventeen, and twenty; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventh amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words: "Provided, That said expenditures shall not be applied to any works not mentioned in the bill making appropriations for repairs, preservation, and completion of certain public works and for other purposes, which passed the House of Representatives June 30, 1868;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eleventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in lieu of the words stricken out by the Senate insert the following words: "Provided, That the sum shall be in full of all claims against the Government for work done or damages incurred on the Washington aqueduct;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twelfth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment add the following words: "to be expended under the immediate direction of the officer detailed to act as Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu the following:

"Rock Island arsenal:

"For the erection of a bridge to connect Rock Island arsenal with the city of Rock Island, Illinois, $100,000; said bridge to be constructed and completed for the sum hereby appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu of said Senate amendment the following: "§10,180 63; Provided, That nothing shall be paid except subject to existing provisions of law, and upon the finding and certificate of the Third Auditor that the same is actually due;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: add to said amendment the following: "Provided, That no part of the money appropriated for this purpose shall be paid until the accounts for feeding such destitute Indians shall be fully investigated by a commission to consist of Lieutenant General William T. Sherman, Major General P. H. Sheridan, and Major General C. C. Augur, and the said commission is hereby authorized, for the purpose of such investigation, to call and examine witnesses in this behalf, and only the amount that said commission shall certify to be equitably and justly due shall be paid; and said commission shall sit at Leavenworth, Kansas, and shall have power to appoint a clerk, at a salary of five dollars per day for the time actually employed; and the sum of $1,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for clerk hire, traveling and incidental expenses of said commission is hereby appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in lieu of the words stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That hereafter no contract shall be entered into for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement whatever, which shall bind the Government to pay a larger sum of money than the amount in the Treasury appropriated for the specific purpose. And if any officer of the Government shall knowingly contract for the erection, repair, or furnishing of any public building, or for any public improvement which shall bind the Government to pay a larger amount than the specific sum appropriated for such purpose, such officer shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by imprisonment not less than six months nor more than two years, and shall pay a fine of $2,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-fourth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment after the word "dollars" in line fourteen to the end of the amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

L. M. MORRILL,

BOSCOE CONKLING,

J. R. DOOLITTLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURNE,

W. H. KELSEY,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the gentleman will explain what the Senate have added on.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. A million and a half for rivers and harbors instead of the river and harbor bill of $7,000,000.

Mr. BROOKS. What is the amount of the bill now?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Three million five hundred thousand.

Mr. RANDALL. Have they placed the river and harbor bill beyond resurrection for this session?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir. With the passage of this bill it is beyond resurrection for this session, and I hope for every session.

Mr. RANDALL. I join you in that.

Mr. EGGLESTON. I understand this $1,500,000 is not to be used for any other works than those named in the river and harbor bill which passed this House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is the proviso to the amendment. The report was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and before moving to lay that motion on the table I desire to say a word.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say to the House that the deficiency bill just passed is the last of the appropriation bills, and the public can now figure up the entire amount of the money appropriated by Congress for the next fiscal year. The bills had been considered with the greatest care by the Appropriation Committees of both Houses, and I think there are less objectionable items in the bills than there has been for many years. The expenditures have been largely cut down and a great deal of vicious legislation that has crept in during the war has been purged from the statute-books. And I can say, too, that the bills are all through in good season and at a period anterior to the time of fixing the day of final adjournment. That is a matter, I believe, unprecedented in the history of the legislation of the House. Formerly the most of the large appropriation bills were rushed through at the very last hours of the session and in the most hurried and confused manner, but few of the members having any idea of what they contained.

As to the amount of the appropriations for the present year there is the fixed sum for interest on the public debt, for pensions, and for bounties, in the aggregate amounting to $190,000,000. That amount cannot be lessened. It is the ordinary expense for carrying on all the operations of the Government for the present fiscal year that this Congress is responsible for, and the people will demand to know what they are. They will not reach more than one hundred and two millions, and that will be against seventy millions in gold coin in the administration of Mr. Buchanan. Considering all things, the increase of population, the natural increase of expenditures, the increased prices that everything the Government has to buy, I believe the comparison is a most favorable one, and the fact will forever stand out to the credit of this Congress. The estimates of expenditure for this year sent in by the present Democratic Administration were $372,000,000, including all interest on public debt, pensions, and bounties; but the entire amount appropriated by this Republican Congress, including such interest, bounties, and pensions, will not amount to more than $292,000,000, a difference of $80,000,000 in favor of Congress. With these appropriation bills through, and without thrusting upon the country the schemes of robbery and plunder with which we are threatened, and which are now lying in wait, if we should now promptly adjourn and go home we will be welcomed by our constituents as faithful public servants.

Mr. RANDALL. The Republicans are responsible for this Administration.

Mr. NIBLACK. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. BROOKS. After making his speech now to move to lay upon the table without a word of reply, it is a trick.

Mr. RANDALL. A sneak.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not say it was a sneak. I said it was a trick for the gentleman to avail himself of the opportunity at the very last moment to prepare a written speech and lay down certain allegations, and then move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, giving nobody a chance to reply.

Mr. SPALDING. I call the gentleman to order. Debate is out of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I gave merely facts and figures entirely appropriate to the report I made.

Mr. BROOKS. I cannot see how the remarks were appropriate.

Mr. RANDALL. If I were to express my opinion, I would say I consider this as the most profligate Congress that ever sat.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The question being put on laying on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the report of the committee of conference, there were—ayes 64, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-two, noes not counted.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT REMARKS.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, asked and obtained leave to print a speech intended to be delivered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURLEIGH asked and obtained leave to print some remarks on the subject of our Indian relations. [For these speeches see Appendix.]

FUNDING BILL—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the funding bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BENTON.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I shall be glad to have a moment to present a few facts connected with or illustrative of this subject. I know I cannot have time now to present my views as fully as I could desire, and I will only say a few words.

Mr. BENTON. I will yield a moment.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. It is perfectly well understood that we must either provide for the payment of the public debt within the time limited in, and according to the terms of the existing bonds or we must extend the payment over a still greater period of time. Nearly the whole debt is payable within sixteen years. To pay this in the time limited would require us to raise by taxation $150,000,000 a year applicable to the principal of the debt, and this is a sum which the people cannot endure. Now, sir, for the purpose of showing the expediency of extending the time of payment beyond that now provided, I have prepared a table showing the population and wealth of the United States from 1790 up to 1860, with an estimate of the wealth and population for the years 1870 and 1900 based on the ratio of increase that existed from 1790 to 1860.

Assuming that the public debt now is, and in 1870 will continue to be, $2,600,000,000, this table shows that the debt will then be $60 46 per capita of all the population, and to pay it would require one dollar out of every fourteen dollars of all the wealth of the country. But if the payment is deferred to the year 1900 the debt per capita will only be twenty-six dollars, and it will only take one dollar out of every $156 15 of the wealth of the country to pay it.

The facts disclosed by this table, it seems to me, sufficiently demonstrate the expediency of extending the time of payment to a period when our wealth and population shall have so increased as that the debt will constitute but an insignificant charge upon either. At the same time it seems to me it is better that the debt shall fall due at different periods during the next forty years, so that it may be within the control of legislation either for gradual payment or for the purpose of securing better terms if the financial condition of the country shall admit of it. I am aware that I have no time now to present my views at any length. I therefore content myself with saying that I am opposed to the third, fourth, and fifth sections of the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] providing a sinking fund in the form therein authorized. I cannot say that either the original bill or the substitute contains the plan of funding which I would prefer, but it may be better to adopt one or the other of these rather than fail in getting any. They contemplate a reduction of the rate of interest paid by the people, and this is an object of no small consequence. Gentlemen who oppose all schemes of funding have failed to present any practicable plan for the management of the public debt which will relieve the people, and in the absence of any better scheme we should adopt the best which is attainable. The table is as follows:

Year.	Decades.
1790	Population United States.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Speaker, the subject under consideration has already, it seems to me, taken a very wide range, and although the questions that have been raised on the other side of the House may not be considered as irrelevant to the question now before us, in my judgment it can hardly be considered good policy for us to be raising questions upon which we are divided, upon which all parties are divided in this House, as to how we can pay the debt which we owe at the cheapest rate, when we are about to issue our bonds, or when we are discussing a measure proposing to issue bonds at a very low rate of interest for the purpose of obtaining a consolidation of the public debt. I do not agree that it is good policy to extend our debt because of the increasing population of the country and its increasing ratio of resources. As all will admit, the prosperity and increase of population and resources of this country have been almost without precedent in the history of nations, and we may expect that there will be a corresponding increase for the future. But though that may be assumed as reasonable, still I apprehend it is not a wise policy for us to remain in debt one single year or day longer than it is necessary. I think it is the true policy of a nation as it is of an individual, to discharge its indebtedness as soon as it may reasonably do so, and for that reason I favor the issue of bonds coming due at different periods. It seems to me that all or almost entirely all of our indebtedness might be discharged within the period of forty years specified in the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, without burdening our people.

But I wish to allude to the very remarkable argument addressed to the House by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.] He took the position that the Government should enlist in the business of redeeming bank issues, and that the greenbacks that had been issued for that purpose should be transferred from the banks and used for the purpose of discharging bonds. What further? He took the remarkable position that the act authorizing the issue of legal-tender notes was unconstitutional, null, and void, and he stood up here before this House and asserted that he would pay off the indebtedness of the nation in a similar issue in the future. I should like to know what sort of an accommodating conscience the gentleman must have if he can work round in favor and support of an act which he declares here in his place to be unconstitutional, null, and void. It seems to me a curious kind of logic and law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] has now fourteen minutes remaining.

Mr. SCHENCK. In that very brief time I propose to submit a remark or two to the House.

Mr. ROSS. If the gentleman could squeeze in five minutes for me, I should like it very well.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is impossible. I have given away nearly all my time.

I have already adverted to the leading distinctions between the bill presented by the Committee of Ways and Means, modified afterward by the Committee of the Whole, and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] I have nothing that I need add to what I said in regard to the advantage of a consolidation in a long bond at a low rate of interest. But it has been objected that there will be great inconvenience in having it consolidated into a form of public securities, which will fall due all at the same time. So that I have only to reply that it gives me no apprehension whatever; if we can establish our credit so as to be able to borrow at three or four per cent. money at forty years, we give such character of permanency to the investment, it will be so sought for purposes of settlement in the future, both at home and abroad, that I do not think we shall have any difficulty as the time approaches when the forty years expire in getting whatever continuation of credit the United States may at the time seem to need. The truth is, as every one can readily understand, that a debt thus contracted, thus invested, instead of being one that the holders will be desirous to collect when the bonds fall due, will be more apt in the form which it will then assume, and constituting the kind of security which it will, to be desired by the holders themselves to be kept afloat, and they will in fact have more anxiety not to be paid than they will have to demand payment at the end of that length of time.

My colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in speaking of this matter, spoke of the advantage of having three classes of indebtedness provided for, as in the Senate bill, and expressed a decided preference for that over the funding of the debt in a single bond to run a long time; and he instanced the fact that we found it convenient during the war to meet the public want by putting out a variety of bonds, various forms of public securities. Now, Mr. Speaker, to that I have only to reply that we were forced to that by the expedients that we had to resort to in order to obtain money at all, and the various different expedients by which it was sought to push the public credit, sometimes in one way, sometimes in another, to meet the enormous demands made upon us. It was not so much a matter of choice as a matter of necessity during that time of high pressure in the pushing of the public credit which existed during the period of the war.

But, Mr. Speaker, if there were any one thing that more than all others illustrates the propriety of giving that sort of security to a bond such as we propose, which is to be found in a distinct declaration of precisely what the holder has when he takes such a bond, it might be found in the very debate in which we have been engaged here. What is the great source of trouble now, of difference of opinion, of distraction in council in regard to the public debt? It is the question which rises in regard to the kind of lawful money in which the principal of that debt is to be paid. The five-twenties have their interest payable in coin, and nobody raises a question as to whether that interest shall be paid otherwise than in coin. But the law providing for the five-twenties, if not altogether silent with respect to the kind of money in which the principal was to be paid, left, perhaps, too much to be inferred from the various acts of legislation, and the various circumstances attending the negotiation of the loan, as to what was intended by the Government in regard to the manner in which the principal was to be paid.

There are those who hold to what they conceive to be the very letter of the law, and claim that it is not required that the principal of these bonds shall be paid in coin. There are others who claim that the concurrent legislation of the time, the manifest intentions and declarations of Congress made contemporaneously with the contraction of the debt, and the representations made by the Secretary of the Treasury and his agents when that debt was put upon the market, rendered clear and manifest the purpose of the Government to pay, and to be understood as intending to pay, the principal as well as the interest in coin. One party, those who advocate one side of this question, insist upon payment in coin as being according to the spirit and purpose of the law. The other party insist upon payment in other money as being according to the letter of the law.

Now, does any one suppose that if it had been distinctly laid down in terms in the very body of the law itself, and if it was laid down in the very body of the bond itself, which was issued under that law, that the principal as well as the interest was to be paid in coin, there would ever have been any question made among our people or our politicians as to what was meant? I have too much faith in our American people to believe that they ever intend to repudiate, however closely they may approach it in any construction they may give to their public engagements. But let it be laid down in the law itself, in the body of the contract, in distinct, positive, unmistakable terms, that there are certain conditions attaching to the loan, and my word for it the American people will never undertake to rid themselves of the obligations of the contract into which they themselves expressly entered.

Therefore it is, among other reasons, that I find a strong argument in favor of obtaining money upon the most favorable terms, by making a bond long to run, by reducing the interest upon it to the lowest possible rate at which we can make the funding successful, and accompanying the authority to issue bonds of this character with such clear, unmistakable provisions in regard to exemption from taxation, and in regard to the kind of money in which not only the interest but the principal shall be paid, that he who runs may read, and that we may be clear hereafter at least of those questions which now agitate the country so much. That is the kind of bonds for which this bill provides; those are the declarations to be made in the very letter of the law, commending it to all honest minds, and giving satisfaction to all who become, or are likely to become, creditors of the Government; so that hereafter no question, either with regard to the letter or the spirit of the law, can be made when we come again to consider what is the character of our public securities thus created.

This, then, is the scheme proposed—a funding for a length of time at low interest. What else is there in the bill? If gentlemen will but run their eye over it, they will find that while in the first section they have the choice between on the one hand the proposition of the Senate, embracing a clear expression of the kind of securities, classifying them into three sorts, and on the part of the House an equally clear or a clearer expression of the character of the securities, which are made to partake of but one class in the scheme upon which they are to be issued, there are in the other sections of the bill provisions which I think ought to commend themselves to the approbation of those called to legislate on this subject.

In the second section there is what is equivalent to a sinking fund provided for by an appropriation of $135,000,000 per year out of the money received from customs, being enough to pay all the interest, and to leave in the very first year an excess of about ten million dollars, to be applied toward extinguishing the principal of the debt; and this excess must necessarily, as that debt is in process of extinguishment, increase so as to afford more and more each year to be applied to that purpose.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Upon this point, with reference to the sinking fund, the gentleman will allow me to make a single suggestion. If the bill as it stands were to become operative, the entire interest payable upon the whole public debt would be less than $80,000,000 a year. The proposition is to postpone the payment of any part of the principal for forty years. By the sinking fund contemplated there would be set aside each year $135,000,000, for the payment of the interest and the principal, leaving each year for the payment of the principal of the public debt, $55,000,000, which the Government would be utterly incapable of using till the expiration of the forty years.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is arguing upon the supposition that all this is to be funded at once.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I argue upon the theory of the bill, which proposes to fund the entire interest-bearing debt of the United States.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman's proposition is founded upon the supposition of the immediate funding of our debt into this forty year loan at three and sixty-five hundredths interest. The gentleman must remember that at this time we have, to start with, about one hundred and twenty-five million dollars to provide for, and that, though as I said, from year to year the amount applicable to the extinguishment of the principal will increase, thus diminishing rapidly as it progresses the amount of the public debt, yet it does not start at the point which the gentleman assumes to be the initial point.

There is but one objection which it strikes me may perhaps require some clearer expression in this section, which has been virtually adopted from the Senate bill with only some slight verbal modification. It may, perhaps, be that the section, is not drawn with sufficient clearness in reference to the question whether as the customs are collected in coin this $135,000,000 is a provision for the payment of all the interest in coin. If there be any question about that, it can easily be obviated in a committee of conference.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted. The previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered. The first question is on concurring in the various amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole. After those shall be acted on the question will be on striking out all after the enacting clause of the bill and inserting the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill and pending amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to make a motion to postpone the bill till the third Monday of December.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not now be in order, as the previous question is operating.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 35, nays 100, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Beck, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Cary, Dockery, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goldaday, Grover, Haight, Hill, Holman, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Randall, Ross, Storer, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Broomal, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Cullom, Daves, Delano, DeWees, Dixon, Donnelly, Eila, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Higby, Hinds, Hopkins, Chester D. Stevens, Stone, John Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—80.

So the House refused to lay the bill and amendments upon the table.

During the vote, Mr. ALLISON stated that his colleague, Mr. WILSON, was absent on account of sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question next recurred on the amendments of the Committee of the Whole.

First amendment:

Strike out the words "and of such denominations as he may prescribe," and insert in lieu thereof "as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum;" so it will read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe, and of denominations of fifty dollars, or some multiple of that sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Second amendment:

Strike out the words "twenty, thirty, and forty years, respectively, and bearing the following rates of yearly interest, payable semi-annually in coin, that is to say, the issue of bonds falling due in twenty years shall bear interest at five per cent.; bonds falling due in thirty years shall bear interest at four and a half per cent.; and bonds falling due in forty years shall bear interest at four per cent.," and in lieu thereof insert "forty years, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum; so it will read as follows:

Redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the United States after forty years, and bearing interest, payable semi-annually in coin, at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths per cent. per annum.

Mr. BROOKS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 61, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Bingham, Boyden, Boyer, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Deweese, Dockery, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Gravely, Grover, Hamilton, Hinds, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, John Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—80.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Third amendment:

Strike out the words "shall be exempt from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority, and the same and the interest thereon, and the income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, other than such income tax as may be assessed upon other incomes;" and in lieu thereof insert as follows: "And the interest thereon, and income therefrom, shall be exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties to the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority."

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, and HOLMAN were appointed.

Mr. WARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 62, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Bowen, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Earningsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Goss, Griswold, Haughey, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Koonz, Ladin, William Lawrence, Mallory, Maynard, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Polesie, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taylor, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, and William Williams—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Beck, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Cary, Reader W. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelley, Kerr, Knott, Loan, Loughridge, Mann, Marshall, McCullough, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, Orth, Perham, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Taffe, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Auker, Van Trump, Ward, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—62.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Boies, Burr, Roderick B. Butler, Calk, Chanler, Cornell, Dodge, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, French, Gravely, Halsey, Harding, Heaton, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nunn, Paine, Peters, Phelps, Price, Prunyn, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Sypher, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—67.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

Strike out the words "and the proceeds thereof;" also the words "or payment, at the option of the holder or purchaser of," and insert the words "of or in;" so as to read:

And the said bonds shall be exclusively used for the redemption of or in exchange for an equal amount of any of the present interest-bearing debt of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Fifth amendment:

Strike out the words "the existing five per cent. bonds," and so as to read, "other than the three per cent. certificates."

The amendment was agreed to.

Sixth amendment:

Insert the words "and debts past due or maturing before the end of the present fiscal year;" so as to read:

Other than the three per cent. certificates, and debts past due or maturing before the end of the present fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Seventh amendment:

Strike out the words "but not to exceed $700,000,000 shall be of the issue redeemable in twenty years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Eighth amendment:

Strike out the words "in such a manner as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, or as Congress may hereafter direct."

The amendment was agreed to.

Ninth amendment:

Strike out the word "contemplated," and insert in lieu thereof the word "provided."

The amendment was agreed to.

Tenth amendment:

Strike out the following section:
SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any contract hereafter made specifically payable in coin shall be legal and valid, and may be enforced according to its terms, anything in the several acts relating to United States notes to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That this section shall not apply to contracts for the borrowing of currency or the removal or extension of an indebtedness under a contract already entered into, unless such contract originally required payment in coin.

Mr. PIKE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 49, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Baker, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Boies, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Cary, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, Eliot, Earningsworth, Ferry, French, Getz, Goss, Haight, Hamilton, Hinds, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Hunter, Ingersoll, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Hunter, Koonz, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Marshall, Maynard, McClurg, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Peters, Pierce, Polesie, Randall, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Smith, Spalding, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Henry D. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and John T. Wilson—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Blair, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Churchill, Driggs, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haughey, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hulburd, Jenckes, Johnson, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Ladin, Mallory, Mann, Nicholson, Perham, Pike, Pile, Poland, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auker, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodward—49.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Beck, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Burr, Roderick B. Butler, Calk, Chanler, Cobb, Cornell, Delano, Deweese, Dixon, Dockery, Dodge, Finney, Fox, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Heaton, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Nunn, Paine, Phelps, Plants, Price, Prunyn, Raum, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Starkweather, Stone, Sypher, Thomas, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—80.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Eleventh amendment:

In section four, strike out the words "or negotiation," where they first occur, and insert in lieu thereof the words "negotiation or exchange;" so that it will read:

That from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale, negotiation, or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Twelfth amendment:

In the same section, after the words "United States," where they first occur, insert the words, "or of any coin or bullion;" so that it will read:

That from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale, negotiation, or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States, or of any coin or bullion disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Thirteenth amendment:

Insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That after the passage of this act, all exchange, purchases, or sales of the bonds of the United States shall be made by inviting the competition of the public by advertising for proposals for any such exchange, purchases, or sales, which shall be awarded to the best bidder or bidders, the Secretary of the Treasury reserving the right to reject any such bids should he deem it to the public interest to do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

Fourteenth amendment:

Insert the following as an additional section:
SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter the tax on any income arising from the bonds and other interest-bearing securities of the United States, other than those authorized by the first section of this act, payable to any person, State, municipality, body-politic, or corporate company or society, whether corporate or not corporate, out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be assessed and collected by the Treasurer or other disbursing officers of the United States, charged with paying any interest upon the debt of the United States, in the same currency in which said interest is paid; and such collection shall be made by deduction of the amount of the tax from the coupons or interest, due at the time of payment of such interest. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe regulations for the purpose of determining in each case who is the actual owner of the coupon presented for payment of the interest demanded, and whether any exemption to which such owner may be entitled has been already allowed, or is to be deducted.

The question was put on agreeing to the amendment; and there were—yeas 63, nays 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. KELSEY called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELSEY and LOGAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 90, nays 20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river; when the Speaker signed the same.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Fifteenth and last amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

Insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That on and after the passage of this act all authority under any existing law to issue bonds or interest-bearing Treasury notes or obligations of the United States shall cease and determine: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the conversion of Treasury notes known as seven-thirties into five-twenties bonds, nor the issue of the three per cent. certificates of temporary loan, nor the exchange of registered bonds for coupon bonds, nor the issue as subsidy to railroad companies as provided by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having all been disposed of, the question now is upon the substitute for the entire bill offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] which the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to issue coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe of the denomination of $100, or of any multiple of $100, redeemable in coin of the present standard value of the United States, and upon the following terms and conditions, that is to say:

First. That the Secretary of the Treasury may issue bonds as aforesaid to the amount in all of $400,000,000, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the Government at any time after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1883, and bearing interest yearly at the rate of five per cent. in coin, payable semi-annually. And such bonds and the income therefrom shall be exempt from State, municipal, or local taxation, but they shall be liable to such income tax as may be levied by the United States upon other income, not exceeding, however, five per cent. of the interest upon such bonds; and the amount of the tax shall be deducted from the interest upon such bonds when the interest thereon is paid.

Second. The Secretary of the Treasury may also issue bonds as aforesaid to the further amount of $400,000,000, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the Government at any time after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1888, and bearing interest yearly at the rate of four and one half of one per cent. in coin, payable semi-annually. And such bonds and the income therefrom shall be exempt from State, local and municipal taxation, but they shall be liable to such income tax as may be levied by the United States upon other incomes, not exceeding, however, three per cent. of the interest upon such bonds; and the amount of the tax shall be deducted from the interest upon such bonds when the interest thereon is paid.

Third. The Secretary of the Treasury may also issue bonds as aforesaid to the further amount of $400,000,000, redeemable in coin at the pleasure of the Government at any time after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1893, and bearing interest yearly at the rate of three and sixty-five hundredths of one per cent. payable semi-annually in coin. The interest and principal of such bonds shall be made payable in the United States, or at London, Paris, or Frankfurt, at the option of the taker, and shall be exempt from all taxation in or by the United States, and the principal and interest thereof shall be paid as aforesaid without any abatement or deduction whatever.

Holders of bonds known as five-twenty bonds may exchange such bonds for the bonds in this section specified; applicants for an exchange of bonds may, within the limits prescribed by this act, designate the time when and the place where the new bonds issued to them shall be made payable, but nothing in this act contained shall be construed to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds except in exchange for five-twenty bonds.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act no percentage, deduction, commission, or compensation of any amount or kind shall be allowed to any person for the sale, negotiation, or exchange of any bonds or securities of the United States, or of any coin or bullion disposed of at the Treasury Department or elsewhere on account of the United States; and all acts and parts of acts authorizing or permitting, by construction or otherwise, the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint any agent, other than some proper officer of his Department, to make such sale or negotiation of bonds and securities are hereby repealed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to use the sum of $25,000,000 of coin in the Treasury, and not otherwise appropriated, in the purchase of five-twenty bonds at the market price, as hereinafter provided, the same to be held by the Treasurer of the United States as a sinking fund, in accordance with the provisions of the fifth section of an act passed February 25, 1862, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of United States notes, and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States."

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Treasurer of the United States, and the Attorney General be, and they hereby are, constituted a commission for the purchase of bonds as required in the preceding section. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, from time to time, give public notice for proposals for the sale of said bonds to the United States, and said commissioners may accept such proposals as they deem advantageous to the public interests. The bonds so purchased shall be legibly and indelibly marked "The property of the loan sinking fund of the United States." The Treasurer shall cause the interest to be paid upon such bonds, and the amount thereof shall in like manner be invested in the bonds of the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the purchases of bonds authorized in the third section of this act shall be made during the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1868.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to give public notice, whenever the amount of coin in the Treasury belonging to the United States exceeds $20,000,000 in addition to the amount appropriated by the third section of this act, that he will anticipate the payment of interest then first to become due upon the bonds of the United States to an amount as near as may be of the excess over said $20,000,000; such payments to be subject to a rebate of interest at the rate specified in the bonds.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, prohibited from making sales of gold for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 72, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Benton, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Brownell, Broomall, Benjamin F. Butler, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, French, Haughey, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Jencks, Judd, Kelley, Ketcham, Koonitz, Lafin, William Lawrence, Loan, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Morrill, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sawyer, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, Trowbridge, Twichell, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elisha B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and William Williams—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baker, Beatty, Beck, Bingham, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Deweese, Dockery, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferry, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hamilton, Hawkins, Heaton, Hinds, Holman, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Thomas L. Hunter, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Mann, Marshall, Maynard, McClurg, Miller, Mullins, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Norris, O'Neill, Pike, Polk, Randall, Ross, Schenck, Seofield, Shanks, Smith, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Aiken, Van Trump, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Woodward—72.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin Blackburn, Blaine, Bower, Buckley, Burr, Roderick B. Butler, Calkins, Callis, Chanler, Cornell, Dodge, Farnsworth, Finney, Fox, Goss, Gravely, Griswold, Halsey, Harding, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kitchen, Lash, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, McCullough, Moorhead, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsam, Nunn, Paine, Phelps, Planis, Price, Pruyn, Raun, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Sypher, Taber, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Wood, and Woodbridge—76.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

Mr. ROSS. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until December next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order while the previous question is operating.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, with a view to move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until December next.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot now be made, because the rule says that the previous question cannot be reconsidered when it is partly executed. And the previous question will not be exhausted until the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WARD. Then I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. WARD. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were fifteen in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative not being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the bill on the table, and it was not agreed to; there being upon a division—ayes thirty-four, noes not counted.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Now, that the judgment of the House, as shown by various votes, is that if any loan bill is to pass it is one that postpones the possibility of paying any portion of the public debt for forty years, accompanied by a declaration from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. SCHENCK] that he expects the public credit will then be so good that it can be extended for another period of time, which to my mind is equivalent to an indefinite postponement of all effort to pay the public debt of the country, I am constrained to say that I for one will vote against the bill. I now demand the previous question, and call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will not demand the previous question after misrepresenting me as he has done.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Certainly not. I had no intention of misrepresenting the gentleman in any way. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. What I said, Mr. Speaker, was this: that so far from being apprehensive on that account, I believed the holders of bonds running forty years at this low rate of interest would be more anxious not to have them paid than to have them paid; but at the same time I called attention to that provision of the bill for an appropriation from year to year for extinguishing the principal as well as paying the interest; and throughout I declared my belief in the capacity of the Government to meet these demands upon it. The gentleman, therefore, misapprehended my position entirely.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Undoubtedly I misunderstood the gentleman to some extent; but his explanation does not change the force of what I said. The construction which I have put upon the language of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means conforms, I believe, substantially to what he has now said. In the first place we are to have no means of paying any portion of the public debt for forty years. The bill provides for a sinking fund by means of which there will be applicable each year to the payment of the public debt a residuum of more than fifty million dollars, which annual residuum, if put out at interest, would pay the public debt in less than forty years, leaving an excess equal to nearly half that debt. I should be glad if the gentleman would state, as the financial organ of this House, how the people of this country are to hold an accumulation of fifty millions in gold each year for forty years. That is the question which the bill presents.

I do not desire to indulge in any debate upon this matter; but I consider the whole proposition so entirely unwise as a measure of financial policy that for one I shall feel constrained to vote against the passage of the bill. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think the ordinary time for debate has already been exhausted, and I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. KELSEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 68, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Bailey, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boyden, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Gravely, Griswold, Higby, Hill, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. So the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. On laying on the table the motion to reconsider I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table, there being—ayes seventy-seven, noes not counted.

CONTESTED ELECTION—HOGAN VS. PILE.

Mr. COOK. I now call up the Missouri contested-election case of Hogan vs. Pile.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move the House adjourn, as this case will now come up the first thing in the morning.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. GROVER: The petition of William Mangum, for additional compensation as major of the eleven Kentucky volunteers.

By Mr. O'NEILL: The petition and papers of John Carrigan, asking for pay as second lieutenant company A first New Jersey artillery, from February 10 to March 10, 1865.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of officers of the Army, praying Congress to pass General SCHENCK's bill to fix and equalize the pay of officers, and to establish the pay of enlisted soldiers of the Army.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 22, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. FERRY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, communicating a letter from Brevet Major General A. B. Dyer, chief of ordnance, asking a trial by court-martial for offenses imputed to him in a report made to Congress by the joint Committee on Ordnance; which was referred to the joint Committee on Ordnance, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

SENATORS FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. WILSON presented the credentials of Hon. Thomas J. Robertson, elected by the Legislature of South Carolina a Senator from that State for the term ending March 3, 1871; and of Hon. Frederick A. Sawyer, elected by the Legislature of South Carolina a Senator from that State for the term ending March 3, 1873.

The credentials were read.

Mr. HOWARD. As to one of the gentlemen named in those credentials, Mr. Sawyer, I hold in my hand a remonstrance signed by about a dozen members of the Legislature of South Carolina, protesting against his being allowed to take his seat in this body, and making various statements tending to show that in their opinion he is not entitled to the seat. I also have affidavits and various other papers which tend to establish that objection. There seems to be a good deal of opposition to allowing Mr. Sawyer to take the oath, even if he be ready to do so; and I think that in fairness to all parties the credentials ought to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to make investigation, and with authority to send for persons and papers. I think the public good will be promoted by such a reference. I therefore beg leave to present the protest of which I spoke, together with the affidavits, with a view to have them referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I also present a letter from the clerk of the senate of South Carolina showing that certain members whose seats were contested, the contest not being yet settled at the time of the election, voted for Mr. Sawyer. How much that may be worth I do not undertake to say; but I beg to present these papers, and move that the credentials be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with power to send for persons and papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the credentials of Mr. Sawyer, Senator-elect from South Carolina, together with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. POMEROY. I notice that the credentials of the two Senators are together. I suppose Mr. Robertson can be sworn in?

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to Mr. Robertson being sworn in.

Mr. POMEROY. I know nothing against the other gentleman being sworn in myself; but certainly I have no objection to the oath being administered to Mr. Robertson.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no objection that I am aware of to the oath being administered to Mr. Robertson.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not know but that the credentials of both being together they would, under this motion, both have to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOWE. The reference will result in a protracted inquiry upon the question of admitting one of these Representatives from that State.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to say, if the Senator will allow me, that there is no objection to Mr. Robertson taking the oath.

Mr. HOWE. But I say it will result in excluding for a long time, during a protracted inquiry, one of the representatives from that State. It is a long time since we have had the advantage of any representative from the State of South Carolina in these seats, and unless there are grave reasons for doubting the propriety of admitting the representatives now sent to us, I would rather that we should no longer forego the privilege of having the counsels and aid of representatives from the State of South Carolina.

The charges made against this gentleman I have not listened to very carefully, for I was employed at the time the Senator from Michigan was stating them. I have heard something of them outside, and have heard a good deal said in reference to the character of Mr. Sawyer and of his antecedents. The conviction left upon my mind, after all I have heard, is that we are extremely fortunate in the selection which has been made by the Legislature of South Carolina in this instance. The evidence submitted to me individually is such as leaves me no room to doubt that we shall secure by accepting Mr. Sawyer the services of a highly cultivated, a thoroughly honest, and a thoroughly patriotic man. This conviction is brought to my mind by the testimony outside of that which has been read at your desk; but I must once more submit to the Senate that that testimony ought to be conclusive upon the Senate.

The Legislature of South Carolina, which you have recently by solemn act authorized to choose two Senators to take their places here, have selected this one out of all the citizens of that State as the one they prefer. By your laws he is required to take a certain oath. Whether he can take it or not truthfully, I say now, as I have said in other similar cases, I do not know; but I wish to submit once more that the only true way to determine whether he can take it or not is to let him go to the desk and tender the oath to him. Since no allegation is made against the age of this gentleman or his citizenship, or any one of the constitutional qualifications prescribed to Senators on this floor, and since he has been chosen by a Legislature authorized to make the choice and authorized by this very Congress and only a few days since, I think it is going altogether too far for us to say now upon the protest of an insignificant minority of the members of that Legislature that this gentleman shall not be allowed to take his seat pending this investigation. I respectfully insist that he ought to be permitted to take the oath if he will, and take his seat which is assigned to him by the Legislature of the State and act as a Senator; and if it is said or believed that inquiry and investigation might disclose reasons which would authorize us to exclude him, I have no objection then to letting the credentials go to the Committee on the Judiciary and letting that investigation go on; but I think while that is pending South Carolina ought to be represented.

Mr. HARLAN. I rise to make an inquiry whether it would not be a privileged motion to move that the other Senator-elect, Mr. Robertson, be admitted to take the oath. There seems to be no objection to his being sworn in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection to that. I do not know that this motion contemplates an objection to his being sworn in.

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a reference of the credentials that is proposed.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the other Senator-elect, Mr. Robertson, be permitted to take the oath.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no objection to either of them, as I understand.

Mr. HARLAN. I prefer to act on one at a time.

Mr. HOWARD. There is no objection to Mr. Robertson being sworn in if he chooses to be sworn in before this motion is disposed of. I shall be quite willing that he shall be sworn in.

Mr. POMEROY. I have had laid before me, as I suppose other Senators have, this case, and I do not see enough in it to justify a reference to a committee. I agree with what the Senator from Wisconsin says, that the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, knowing all the facts that the Committee on the Judiciary can know, have elected Mr. Sawyer; and if the facts be as represented to me on both sides, I can see no case in the world made out against him. I think both ought to be sworn in.

Mr. FERRY. I should be opposed to the reference of the credentials of Mr. Sawyer to the Committee on the Judiciary. It seems to me that the proper course is to administer the oath to both the Senators-elect, and then if the Senator from Michigan has a remonstrance tending to show that either of them is not entitled to a seat, let the remonstrance be presented and referred to the Judiciary Committee for the purpose of examination; but I certainly believe that both the Senators should be sworn in on the credentials presented here, and then the remonstrance can be referred and investigated.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that the protest and remonstrance of members of the Legislature be read by the Clerk, so that the Senate may be in possession of the facts.

Mr. CAMERON. It seems to me that this is not the time to read that remonstrance.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very short.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not care how short it is. These gentlemen come here with prima facie evidence of their election, and it is our duty, I think, to let them take the oaths prescribed by the Constitution and the laws, and if there be any doubt about their right to be here it can be investigated afterward. Let them come upon the floor. They are sent here by a State as sovereign as any other State represented here, and their election is certified in the same manner that ours is. How would the Senator from Michigan have felt if, when his credentials were presented, some three or four persons who did not like him personally out there in Michigan had sent a remonstrance against his taking the oath? I know I should have felt indignant if some fellow in Pennsylvania had made a difficulty about my right to a seat, and I am sure every good man here would have stood by me. I think the right way, and it is the customary way, is to let the Senators come forward with their credentials and be sworn in and take their seats, and if anybody doubts their right we can then investigate it.

Mr. DRAKE. The course suggested by the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, and, I believe, by the honorable Senator from Connecticut and the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, is a direct abandonment of the position the Senate took in the case of Mr. Thomas, of Maryland. We sent his case to the Committee on the Judiciary because there were charges made against his loyalty, and we had those charges investigated, and the Senate finally decided that he should not be permitted to take the oath of office here, because, in the judgment of the Senate, he could not take it truly. Now, if I understand this case from South Carolina, the very same question arises here, and we are invoked now to pass over the precedent set by the Senate in the Thomas case and to admit this gentleman to be sworn and then go into an investigation of the propriety of his taking the oath. I think that we should be consistent in our action, and should do the same in every case of a like character that we did in the case of Mr. Thomas.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I am surprised that there should be any objection to this gentleman. I believe he is a native of Massachusetts, and a member certainly of the loyal league in Massachusetts. He went originally from Nashua, in my State, and, as I understand, is as sound a Republican as there is on this floor. In 1864 he was in the State, I know, stumping for the Republican cause and was sound to the core at that time.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask my honorable friend whether he is a citizen of Massachusetts or of South Carolina?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Not now of Massachusetts; he was at one time.

Mr. HOWARD. All I ask in behalf of the remonstrants is that we shall deal with this case on the same principles that we applied to the case of Mr. Thomas, of Maryland. There the question was whether Mr. Thomas, who offered himself here, and announced himself, through his friends, ready to take the oath required by law should be allowed to take that oath. Allegations were made against such allowance; charges were brought against Mr. Thomas, tending to show that he was disloyal; that he had actually committed acts of disloyalty, and the Senate very properly referred the whole matter to the Judiciary Committee under precisely the same instructions which I ask in the present case.

As the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania objected to the reading of the paper which I presented, I ask that it may be returned to me, and I will read it as part of my remarks, unless it is allowed to be read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the reading of a paper is objected to, the rules require that the point shall be decided by the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the paper be read, which motion is objected to. The decision of it, by our rules, belongs to the Senate. The question is whether the paper shall be read.

The question being put, the reading of the paper was ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is there any objection to the other Senator being admitted to be sworn in?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None at all, and he will be when we dispose of this question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose he would have a right to vote on this very question; and I think some statements which he possibly might make might be material to his colleague.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the oath may be administered to Mr. Robertson.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that Mr. Robertson be allowed to take the oath, which is a privileged question, and takes precedence of the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Kansas, that Mr. Robertson, Senator-elect, be permitted to take the oath.

Mr. DAVIS. There is objection to both these gentlemen being admitted to take the oath. I object myself; and I object upon the ground that I hold in my hand a return in favor of Benjamin F. Perry as one of the Senators from the State of South Carolina; and I also hold a return in favor of James B. Campbell as another Senator from the State of South Carolina.

Several SENATORS. Their time is out.

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, no; their time is out according to the rescripts of the Radical party, but not according to the Constitution of the United States. Their terms according to the Constitution have not expired; but, to be sure, the Senate may prescribe new terms for these gentlemen, as these are times of political innovation. I do not rise to make any protracted opposition, but merely that the record may be fairly made up, that it be understood that there is objection to both or either of these gentlemen being allowed to be sworn in as members of the Senate, on the ground that here is evidence of a better right in favor of other gentlemen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that Mr. Robertson, Senator-elect, be permitted to qualify.

The motion was agreed to; and the oaths prescribed by law having been administered to Mr. ROBERTSON, he took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper, the reading of which was ordered, will now be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Protest.

The undersigned, members of the senate and house of representatives of the General Assembly of South Carolina, and others, citizens of said State, do hereby solemnly protest against the admission of Frederick A. Sawyer, into the Senate of the United States, as a Senator from South Carolina; and the undersigned further declare and aver that Hon. A. G. Mackey, of Charleston, South Carolina, is legally and of right entitled to the seat in the Senate of the United States now claimed by the said Sawyer; and the undersigned present the following facts in support of their allegations, and believing them to be true they respectfully request that they may be permitted to sustain them by good and sufficient evidence before the honorable the Senate of the United States.

First. It is credibly alleged and believed that the aforementioned F. A. Sawyer was engaged in running or in aiding and abetting the running of the blockade at the port of Charleston, South Carolina, in the years 1862, 1863, and a part of the year 1864, and that he held an office under the rebel authorities in the State of South Carolina during said period, and was a member of a military organization in the city of Charleston in the year 1864, which organization was in armed hostility to the Government of the United States.

Second. That at the election held this day for a United States Senator, for the long term, by the senate and house of representatives of the State of South Carolina, the two candidates on the final ballot were the said F. A. Sawyer and A. G. Mackey; that the total vote cast was 149, requiring 75 votes to elect; and that of the vote so cast the said A. G. Mackey received 68, and the said Sawyer received 76; and your protestants declare and believe that of the votes so cast for the said Sawyer — were illegal, the persons casting the same having their seats contested before the senate and house of representatives of said State for gross frauds in their election, the evidence in regard to which frauds was and is now being considered before the committees on elections of said senate and house; and the names and designations of said persons so illegally voting are as follows, to-wit: John B. Moore, representative, Anderson county; John Wilson, representative, Anderson county; J. H. Reid, senator, Anderson county; Joel Foster, Spartansburg; Claude A. Turner, representative, Spartansburg; W. C. Keith, representative, Anderson; O. M. Doyle, representative, Anderson.

And your protestants further declare that the representatives from the county of Lancaster and the senator from said county voted for said Sawyer, although the major general commanding the second military district had refused to recognize their election by his general order No. 120.

Wherefore your protestants pray that your honorable body will send for persons and papers in order that the facts herein stated as currently reported, and such as are known to us, may be fully proved.

JOHN B. DENNIS,

Representative from Charleston county.

J. W. WILLS,

Senator from Edgefield.

EDWARD MCKEY,

Representative, Charleston.

S. SAMUELS,

Representative from Chester.

SAMUEL NUCKLES,

Representative from Union.

WILLIAM WELGER,

Representative from Clarendon.

W. B. HOYT,

Senator from Colleton county.

LUCIUS WIMBUSH,

Senator from Chester county.

SAMUEL J. LEE,

Representative.

F. F. MILLER,

Representative, Georgetown, South Carolina.

HENRY JOHNSON,

Representative from Fairfield.

JOSEPH CREW,

Representative from Laurens county.

Mr. HOWARD. It will be noticed that a portion of the charges contained in that paper are of a grave character. They charge Mr. Sawyer with having been engaged in running the blockade, or in aiding and abetting that transaction, and also charge that he was a member of a military organization in Charleston during the years 1862, 1863, and 1864, which was acting in armed hostility against the United States, and also that he held a civil office under the rebel Government of South Carolina. I think that if Mr. Sawyer is not justly amenable to such charges, it is for his interest particularly that there should be an investigation; and that his friends here and elsewhere—and I trust we are all his friends—may be disabused, by a thorough investigation of the facts of the case, of the impressions that that paper has a tendency to create. I really can make no distinction between such a case as the present and that of Mr. Thomas, where we referred the papers with instructions to a committee to make an investigation and to send for persons and papers.

I have but one word to say in answer to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe.] I cannot concede, as he seems to concede, that the very fact of Mr. Sawyer having received a majority of the votes of the Legislature of South Carolina is a complete shield to protect him from all inquiry being made by the Senate into the facts charged by that paper, or into the general question of his ability truthfully to take the oath prescribed by the act of 1862. We have never adopted the principle that is laid down by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, and we never can adopt it until that statute shall be repealed. I think that it is due to Mr. Sawyer and to ourselves and to the country generally that there should be a full and fair investigation of these charges.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I see on the reading of this remonstrance that it raises the question of the election in fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not look into such questions preliminarily.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that it does put in issue the fact of this man's election.

Mr. FESSENDEN. According to my experience the Senate never preliminarily investigates the question of the regularity of an election provided the certificate submitted is in due form. The Senate never goes preliminarily into the examination of the question whether a man is elected, but admits him to his seat and investigates afterward. I think it has never happened while I have been in the Senate that that matter has been investigated preliminarily.

Mr. HOWE. The practice of the Senate upon that subject was not familiar to me. I do not know how it may be; but I conceive that the fact of election is one very proper to be inquired into. It is one of the questions which the Constitution expressly delegates to the Senate, the authority to try and determine.

Mr. CONKLING. There is no allegation of that kind.

Mr. HOWE. I may have misunderstood the remonstrance; but I rise to say that if the fact of election is put in issue by that remonstrance I think it proper that the Committee on the Judiciary should inquire and report on that subject. The Senator from Maine says that the practice is to allow the member to take his seat, and then for the question to be investigated.

Mr. SUMNER. That is so.

Mr. HOWE. I acquiesce in the propriety of that course; and if that issue, if the fact of election is allowed to be tried after the member is admitted to his seat, I do submit that the question of qualifications, of which I conceive the Legislature to be the better judge than the Senate, should also be tried in the same way and at the same time.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope this case will not be referred to the committee; and more particularly I hope it will not be referred in consequence of any supposed similarity between it and the case of Thomas, of Maryland. I venture to say, from hearing this protest, and looking at it, that there is nothing here constituting the proper foundation of any proceedings except the admission of Mr. Sawyer to his seat. I speak first of the allegations in reference to blockade-running in order to point out what I conceive to be the distinction between the case of Thomas and this case. Nobody here, no member of this body, and no person whose name is appended to this paper, undertakes to say anything against Mr. Sawyer in reference to his having been engaged in blockade-running, but the allegation is that "it is credibly alleged and believed." By whom? By nobody whose name is given here. Would the Senate have referred the case of Thomas to the Judiciary Committee upon a paper sent the Senate alleging that it was credibly believed that Mr. Thomas, as Secretary of the Treasury, had been guilty of disloyal conduct? In view of that, the Senator from Michigan presented the report of the officers of the Bank of Commerce, an official report setting out specifically facts within their own knowledge, amounting on their face to grave aspersions against the loyalty and the official integrity of Mr. Thomas. But surely this case is nothing like that. These gentlemen do not even state upon information and belief that any such thing is true; they do not aver that they are informed of these facts or that they believe them; but in phraseology particularly ambiguous and unsatisfactory they say, "it is credibly alleged and believed."

Mr. HOWARD. If the honorable Senator will allow me, I desire to suggest that there is an affidavit accompanying the papers containing the oath of respectable persons charging these facts on Mr. Sawyer.

Mr. CONKLING. I am speaking of the case which is presented. If there is any evidence that we have not heard, I am not speaking on that, of course, but I am submitting to the Senate, to the lawyers of the Senate, that it would be an unheard of act in the course of any proceeding with which I am acquainted to allow persons without even making an allegation upon information and belief, but merely by a statement that they understand that there is such a rumor—for that is all it is—to put upon his trial or defense any person whose rights are involved in the proceeding. If there is any affidavit which the Senator has to read I should be very glad to hear that.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to hear that affidavit read.

Mr. CONKLING. So should I like to have it read.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope it will be read; the Clerk will find it among the papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The document will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Washington county, ss.:

Personally appeared before me, a notary public, in and for said District and county, duly authorized by law to administer oaths, C. C. BOWEN, a member of Congress from the second congressional district of South Carolina, and T. J. Mackey, a citizen of Charleston, in said State, who being duly sworn, depose and say that they are well and personally acquainted with Frederick A. Sawyer, who claims to have been elected a Senator of the United States, by virtue of an election held in the city of Columbia by the Legislature of South Carolina, on the 16th day of July, 1868, and your deponents further declare that they have good and sufficient reasons to believe, and do believe, that the said Sawyer is not eligible to hold a seat in the Senate of the United States by reason of the fact, which can be fully shown by credible witnesses whose names are hereto attached, that the said Sawyer was engaged in aiding and abetting the rebellion against the Government of the United States in the years 1862, 1863, and 1864, by being a shareholder in a blockade company engaged in running the blockade at the port of Charleston, South Carolina, and in furnishing material of war to the so-called confederate States, and aid and comfort to the supporters thereof; and in support of this averment the deponents present the following list of witnesses, to wit:

A. C. Richards, Charleston, South Carolina; Stephen W. Kirk, Charleston, South Carolina; L. F. Potter, Charleston, South Carolina; C. F. Dunham, Charleston, South Carolina; Rev. Thomas O. Rice, New York city; A. G. Mackey, Charleston, South Carolina; Theodore Wagner, Charleston, South Carolina; John Chaik, Charleston, South Carolina; Captain N. N. Coste, Charleston, South Carolina.

And the deponents further declare that they have good and sufficient reasons to believe, and do believe, that the said Sawyer was a member of a military organization in armed hostility to the Government of the United States in the city of Charleston, in the year 1864, and that he did military duty as a member of said organization known as the "Charleston Home Guard," and in proof of this allegation, which deponents verily believe to be true, deponents refer to the said Frederick A. Sawyer himself, and will bring good and credible witnesses to testify to the same.

And deponents further declare that they are informed and believe that in the investigation of the cotton claim of Charles Quinby, the United States, at the city of Charleston, South Carolina, in March, 1863, by the United States district attorney and others, the said Quinby was charged with having been engaged in running the blockade, and the evidence of the said Sawyer, who was a witness for claimant, was objected to by the United States district attorney, on the ground that the said Sawyer had been himself engaged in running the blockade, and it was then and there shown and admitted that the said Sawyer had been to some extent engaged in the shipment and receipt of goods, contraband of war, through the lines of the blockade established by the United States against the ports of the so-called confederate States; and in proof of this averment the deponents confidently appeal to the records of the United States Court of Claims as set forth in the case of said Quinby; and the deponents further declare that the United States district attorney above referred to was and is the chief political supporter of the said Sawyer, but was constrained by his official duty and by the special commissioner of the Court of Claims to except to the testimony of said Sawyer at the time and place herein alleged.

And the deponents further declare, that they are informed and believe, and have good and sufficient reasons to believe, that the said Sawyer, during the rebellion, was engaged in the purchase of confederate bonds issued for the purpose of sustaining the rebellion against the United States, and that John T. Riggs, banker, of the city of Charleston, held and now holds an order from said Sawyer, directing him to purchase confederate bonds for him, the said Sawyer, and that he did so purchase.

And the deponents further declare that the said Sawyer held the office of principal of the State Normal School of South Carolina during the rebellion, and was paid as such by the rebel authorities of said State. And deponents further declare that they have good and sufficient reasons to believe that several of the votes cast for the said Sawyer, upon which he claims his election as United States Senator, were illegally cast, the parties casting the same having their seats contested at the time of voting, for gross frauds in their elections, and it is believed, and the deponents do believe, that one or more of said persons so illegally voting for the said Sawyer, and thereby securing his pretended election, were and are disqualified from holding seats in the Legislature of South Carolina by reason of the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. And deponents further declare that they are informed and believe that the said Sawyer, despite the facts herein alleged, did take the oath of July 2, 1862, known as the iron-clad oath, as collector of internal revenue for the second congressional district of South Carolina in the year 1865.

C. C. BOWEN,
T. J. MACKEY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 20th day of July, 1868.

JOHN E. CALLAN,
Notary Public.

Mr. WILSON. I send to the Chair to be read an affidavit made by a gentleman who professes to have known all the facts in regard to the allegation of blockade running; and before it is read, I will say that I understand Mr. Sawyer went to South Carolina in 1858; that he was superintendent of the public schools in Charleston; that he was there during the rebellion, and that he was always a loyal man. There has been a very sharp contest between him and Doctor Mackey for the Senatorship, exciting the deepest interest and much spirit and feeling. I believe both of them to be loyal men. That is my judgment from what I know in regard to them. I desire to have this paper, which Mr. Sawyer has placed in my hands, read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, county of Charleston, ss.:

Personally appeared, J. D. Geddings, of the State and county aforesaid, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: that he was a resident of the city of Charleston during the entire period of the late war, and that he is at present Assistant Treasurer of the United States, which office he has held since November, 1866. Said deponent further says that he was intimately acquainted, during the whole period of the rebellion, with Frederick A. Sawyer, United States Senator-elect, and that he knows said Sawyer to have been at all times loyal to the United States in word and act. Said deponent further says, in reference to a charge alleged to have been made by certain persons that said Sawyer aided the rebellion by being engaged in blockade running, that this deponent was fully cognizant of the connection of said Sawyer with that business, and that the facts are as follows, namely:

Some time in 1863 said Sawyer became possessed of a small interest (less than $100 in gold value) in a schooner intended to be laden with cotton to run the blockade, and this interest was taken by him on the express condition that said schooner should not return to the States in rebellion but that vessel and cargo should be sold on arrival at a foreign port and the net proceeds of sale should be returned to the shareholders in sterling exchange, said Sawyer declaring that he would have no part or lot in introducing supplies of any kind into the States in rebellion. This deponent further says that the said vessel and cargo was sold in Nassau, New Providence, and the net proceeds thereof were returned to the shareholders in sterling exchange as aforesaid. Said deponent further says that said Sawyer did, in September, 1864, succeed in a project long before entertained by him whereby he escaped from the States in rebellion, went to New England, and earnestly engaged in the campaign having for its object the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. This deponent further says that said Sawyer did carry with him to the North the entire amount of the net proceeds aforesaid as this deponent believes. Said deponent further says that he never heard, nor does he believe, that the said Sawyer had at any time any interest or share in any blockade running venture besides the one above named, and this deponent does not believe that said Sawyer would have consented at any time during the war to do an act which would aid the rebellion.

Sworn and subscribed this 18th day of July A. D. 1868, before me.

J. W. BROWNFIELD,
Clerk Common Pleas and General Sessions.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the strength of this case now, if it has any strength, is to be found in the affidavit, and not in the protest; and I think it is fair to direct the attention of Senators to some remarkable facts about that paper. The names of the affiants are not strangers to us. One of them is the namesake of the competitor of Mr. Sawyer, Mr. Mackey, and I am told is his brother, and his name was recently before us, as was the name of the other affiant, Mr. Bowen, as petitioners to be themselves relieved from the very disabilities, in point of law, which are now alleged against Mr. Sawyer. I think I am right in my recollection that both of these men were included in the act for removing disabilities recently passed.

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. One of them presented a case which I should think might impose upon him properly the obligations of charity and temperance, at least in making imputations upon others. It will be observed that these men, who make this affidavit here within a few days and for a purpose which is obvious, one being the near relative of the contestant of this election in South Carolina, and making it, no doubt, as strong as they could, state nothing, as I insist again, which amounts to a legal or taftable allegation. They say, using the stereotyped phrase—it becomes stereotyped by repetition—that they have "reasons to believe" so and so. What reasons? Suppose an examining magistrate is receiving a complaint for petit larceny of a complainant, does he tolerate him in a statement of that sort? Never. Certain things he may state upon information and belief; but it is not for him to state that locked up in his bosom and conviction are undisclosed reasons upon which he comes to a certain conclusion. That is the allegation here to fasten upon Mr. Sawyer a condition of facts not only extraordinary, but which, I think, not a single member of this body believes exists or can exist. I am free to say that I do not believe one word of it.

What is the difficulty? There has been a contested election, with a great deal of heat evidently on both sides. If there be a shadow of foundation for this charge, what is the difficulty in presenting it to us in the ordinary way, and at the hands of men who know something about it? This secondary evidence is suspicious. There are cases where secondary evidence is not suggestive at all of insincerity or imposition; but when you come to facts so conspicuous, so patent in their character as the facts alleged here, and when the motive for alleging the existence of those facts is so strong as it must be on the part of a large number of persons in South Carolina, I submit that it is very suspicious that no man comes before us upon paper who alleges that he knows anything about it himself, or who is willing even to mention the name of any person who informs him. These two affiants say that they understand that the following-named persons are witnesses on this subject, and they name Mr. Sawyer himself as a credible witness to one allegation. He, doubtless, knows about these other allegations, but they do not name him in regard to them, but they say they are informed that the persons named have information on the subject. I submit that it is utterly unsatisfactory and utterly inadequate, as coming up to any rule that I know of on which the Senate has heretofore acted.

Now, I wish to make a single remark about the latter part of this protest, that to which the honorable Senator from Wisconsin a moment ago directed his attention. I call his attention to the fact that the essence of the allegation is that, "the persons casting the same," that is, this number of votes referred to, had "their seats contested before the Senate and House of Representatives of said State." Now, sir, is it possible that the Senate of the United States or the House of Representatives can go behind the composition of the body which elected the Senator and investigate the question of contested elections there? The Senator from Wisconsin agrees with me that it cannot be done. If the election of a member claiming a seat in this body is contested within the provision of the Constitution, upon that we can pass, and that we can investigate. But if a man comes here saying "I should be entitled to a seat in the Senate but for the fact that in the Assembly of the State of New York certain men were sitting and voting and permitted by that body to vote, whose seats were contested by somebody else," that question we cannot investigate, neither preliminarily nor ultimately. Never, I submit, can that question be brought into this forum.

Mr. HOWE. It that the subsisting fact upon which the allegation is made?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly it is. I will read it:

"That the total vote cast, was one hundred and forty-nine, requiring seventy-five votes to elect, and that of the vote so cast, the said A. G. Mackey received sixty-eight and the said Sawyer received seventy-six, and your protestants declare and believe that of the votes so cast for the said Sawyer were illegal, the persons casting the same having their seats contested before the senate and house of representatives of said State."

That is the gravamen of the allegation.

Mr. HOWE. There is something beyond that about frauds.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh, yes; I see now what you mean—"of said State for gross frauds in their election"—that is, in the election of these persons voting in the Legislature of South Carolina. We shall all agree that that is entirely beyond the purview of our functions here; and therefore the sole question is whether upon vague and secondary evidence, fully met as it seems to me by the paper presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, and fully met by the personal knowledge and personal declarations of Senators here, we are to refer this case to a committee at the very expiration of this session, upon an allegation that witnesses are to be found whose whereabouts are such that these protestants perfectly well know that the inevitable result is to be, no matter how innocent and meritorious Mr. Sawyer is, to throw him over to a future session of Congress before he can qualify and take his seat. That strikes me as being, I will not say the purpose, but the obvious and inevitable effect of this proceeding.

Some man, they have heard, in Charleston has an order under which he or somebody else purchased confederate bonds, and apparently, on this day of grace, or to-morrow, we are to issue a precept, and the marshal is to be sent down into South Carolina to hunt up this individual and bring him here on some future day when we do not expect to be in session. I believe that it is a harsh and discreditable proceeding, which I think this affidavit would warrant in characterizing still more harshly than I do. The honorable Senator from Michigan felt it his duty, and naturally, upon seeing these papers, to present them. He has discharged that duty, and I trust he and all of us may assent to Mr. Sawyer being sworn in, leaving these parties at leisure, their full opportunity and day in court, to turn Mr. Sawyer out if in truth it turns out he should not be here.

Mr. POMEROY. This question, I suppose, should be disposed of by a vote of the Senate. There are two questions of privilege. The higher question of privilege is the motion which I shall make, and that is, that we proceed to swear Mr. Sawyer. If the Senate vote that down, then the next question of privilege will be on the reference. I do not propose to take any time in discussing the matter. One of the witnesses referred to by these contestants, the Rev. T. O. Rice, is a brother-in-law of mine. He stayed there during the war, and it is from him and his wife that I learn all the facts in this case. Their church was burnt down, but they kept together a band of loyal men and women, and this Mr. Sawyer was one of them, and the character given him by the very witness to whom the affiants refer, Rev. T. O. Rice, is of the highest kind.

Mr. HOWARD. It appears to me that the motion made by the honorable Senator from Kansas is not strictly in order.

Mr. POMEROY. I make it because it is the highest question of privilege. It relates to the immediate organization of the body, which takes precedence of a motion to refer.

Mr. HOWARD. It cannot take precedence of my motion.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I raise a question of order, and let us have it decided.

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose that the question of order is debatable.

Mr. POMEROY. No; it is not. I desire to have the question of order settled before the debate proceeds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the question?

Mr. POMEROY. My point is that a motion to swear in the Senator-elect is of the highest privilege, and therefore must be put first.

Mr. HOWARD. My motion is under discussion.

Mr. POMEROY. I admit the Senator's motion is under discussion; but the highest question of privilege is the question of swearing in; and that is the motion I make.

Mr. HOWARD. It is quite plain that the whole question will turn upon this motion, then, for it will be impossible for the Senate to unseat the member after he shall have taken his seat under such a motion as that. The ground of my objection is based upon the statute of 1862, that he cannot take the oath. That is the point of it, and I ask an investigation in behalf of those who have signed these papers to ascertain whether he can safely and truly take the oath.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas raises a question of order.

Mr. POMEROY. I want that settled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rules of the Senate make no prescription on this subject. They throw no light upon it. Therefore we are brought to the principle of reason to guide us. The two motions really amount to the same thing. If these papers are not sent to the committee, then the man is to be sworn in undoubtedly. It results in the same thing. But if a distinction is to be made the first thing is probably to swear in the man if there is no objection to him; but if objection arises that should be disposed of before he can be sworn in. Objections are made to the present applicant. It strikes me that they must be disposed of before he is sworn in. Both questions are the same in effect; there does not seem practically to be any difference in result.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to say one word in reply to the honorable Senator from New York; I will not make a large draft upon the patience of the Senate. I have presented these papers in good faith, and I have no doubt that those who have signed them have signed them in good faith, under the expectation that an investigation would be had. Now, as is generally the case with the honorable Senator from New York, he attempts to do away with the force of the affidavit which I have caused to be read here by throwing ridicule upon it, and insisting that it does not state any particular fact upon which the Senate can act. The ridicule and the contempt with which he speaks of that paper constitutes no argument whatever; and it is hardly worthy of the occasion, let me say, or the subject about which we are talking, that an attempt should be made, without cause, gratuitously, to throw ridicule and discredit upon those deponents.

It is very true that one of the affiants in that affidavit is a brother of Mr. Mackey, who was a competitor against Mr. Sawyer for an election to this body. Is he any the worse for that? Is he any the less a creditable witness because he happens to be the brother of Mr. Mackey? And who is the Mr. Mackey referred to? He was the president of the South Carolina convention that framed the present constitution of that State, and I believe by the assent of all it is admitted that he discharged his duty in the most becoming and intelligent manner; and it is admitted by those best acquainted with that convention and with affairs in South Carolina that that constitution owes much of its excellence to his intelligence, his learning, his patriotism, and his sound Republican doctrine.

Mr. CONKLING. Which one is that, A. G., or the other?

Mr. HOWARD. A. G. But what can we expect in such an affidavit? This affidavit contains as much as is ordinarily contained in an affidavit to procure a criminal warrant against a supposed offender. The Senator shakes his head. I am at issue with him. The question has been decided over and over again by the most intelligent courts that where an affiant makes his affidavit for a warrant upon the best of his knowledge and belief, and as he does believe, they are always upheld unless there be some special statute requiring a more specific statement of his knowledge.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWARD. In one moment. This affidavit contains a specific allegation against Mr. Sawyer of having been engaged in running the blockade, and the very counter-affidavit introduced here to destroy its effect, even as a matter of fact, admits that he was so engaged. The affiants state to us by whom they can prove and establish the charges which they bring against Mr. Sawyer. The affidavit tells us where they live, so that they may be called at any moment. Could anything more be expected, in all reason? I think not. We had much less evidence before us at the time we referred the credentials in the case of Mr. Thomas. In fact, at the time the motion was made there was no showing against Mr. Thomas at all, and it was not until some days after that motion was made that the document to which the honorable Senator refers, the report of the Board of Commerce, of New York, was produced and read to the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, this Mr. A. G. Mackey was supported by a clear majority of all the Republicans in the Legislature of South Carolina. Nobody doubts that; and it is alleged in this affidavit that Mackey himself is an important witness upon the question whether or not Mr. Sawyer is liable to the charge preferred against him.

I think, under the circumstances, that we ought to do no less than to refer these papers and have a careful investigation of the whole subject made, both on Mr. Sawyer's account and on account of the Senate and the country. If he is falsely accused, if there be no rational ground for bringing these accusations against him, is it not important to him that his character should be cleared of these charges? Certainly it is. If he was guilty of running the blockade, and thus rendering aid and comfort to the enemy, we want to know that fact, and the world wants to know it. If he was actually guilty of running the blockade, of being interested in a vessel, as his own friend swears that he was, which vessel was run through our blockade and sold at Nassau, and if he afterward received a part of the purchase-money of this vessel and its cargo, for I suppose it is intended to include the cargo, then is it not perfectly clear that he was guilty of an illegal act? Certainly, I think there can be no doubt of that.

I have, thus, Mr. President, very briefly endeavored to discharge my duty. I know nothing against Mr. Sawyer myself personally; nor would I injure a hair of his head. I hope most earnestly that these charges against him are without foundation; but the only way to ascertain whether they are or not is to make an inquiry and ascertain the facts.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I must confess that I am somewhat surprised at this proceeding before the Senate. The State of South Carolina, by its Legislative Assembly, has elected a Senator, and he comes here with his credentials in due form, which are presented to the Senate, and we proceed to try his title to his seat in this body upon affidavits made by one party and by the other as we would try the validity of some preliminary proceeding in a justice's court. Sir, there ought to be some principle by which this body is to be governed in reference to questions of this nature. I hold the true doctrine to be that when a Senator-elect produces his credentials here in due form he is entitled to take his seat, and if there be any reason why he should be displaced that reason can be subsequently considered by the proper committee.

All the allegations that are made against the right of Mr. Sawyer to take his seat in this body were no doubt made before the Legislature of South Carolina, and there considered. The members of that body, no doubt, were acquainted with the witnesses who, it is alleged, can testify to certain facts. No doubt many of the members of that body had personal knowledge of the history of Mr. Sawyer during the rebellion. All these things were legitimate matters for the consideration of the Legislative Assembly of the State of South Carolina, as to whether or not he was a suitable man to represent that State in the Senate, and when they decided that he was a proper man in every respect, and gave him his credentials, and he comes here, and is willing to take the oath of office, I deny the right of the Senate to say that his case shall be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that the State, for an indefinite length of time, shall be deprived of its right of representation here while that committee is engaged in the consideration of the question.

I propose to vote for allowing Mr. Sawyer to take his seat upon the ground that he has a right, no matter what allegations may be made against him by individuals, to take this oath, if he can conscientiously take it, and occupy his seat in this body. Suppose this doctrine is established; then, whenever a man is elected to the Senate of the United States some of the supporters of a disappointed aspirant will find some reason for objecting to the man who has been elected. No election occurs anywhere in any State, I venture to say, where the disappointed party does not find some ground for objecting to the election. Somebody's seat in the Legislative Assembly is contested; something has been said or done by the successful candidate that is in the estimation of these persons illegal or disloyal; and they make up a statement and send it here to the Senate; and the right of that State to representation is suspended until that matter can be considered. I do not intimate that any such thing is possible, but it would be in the power of a committee opposed in politics to the person elected to withhold any report upon the question for a great length of time, if they were so disposed, and in that way the rights of the State might be prejudiced through the action of a committee opposed in politics to the man who was elected.

I therefore wish it to be understood that so far as I am concerned I make no distinction between this case and the case of Mr. Thomas. Allegations were made against his loyalty; allegations are made against the loyalty of Mr. Sawyer; and I maintain that these allegations may, with propriety, be referred to the Judiciary Committee after this man is allowed to take his seat; and if there be any law anywhere to displace him on that ground, then the committee can so report, and his seat will be vacated; but until that time it seems to me he ought to be allowed to take his seat in this body.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I rise very reluctantly to make an explanation in regard to my colleague. In my opinion he is entirely competent to take the test-oath. The charges against him are made by a set of men who are disappointed, by the friends of Dr. Mackey. In my opinion they are entirely unfounded. It is within my knowledge that Mr. Sawyer spoke throughout a large portion of the State of South Carolina for the ratification of our constitution. I heard him myself on several occasions. He was severe against the men who opposed reconstruction under the laws of Congress. His speeches were well received everywhere by the Republican party. I am astonished at the opposition that I find here this morning against my colleague. Sir, if he is not a Republican, I do not know where you will go to find one. According to all my information, no better Republican can be found on this floor. No one in South Carolina doubts

Mr. Sawyer's honesty in regard to his taking the test-oath. This opposition to him is gotten up on personal grounds by the friends of the defeated candidate.

I hope, from these few considerations, that Senators will vote to allow Mr. Sawyer to take his seat. He is abundantly able to satisfy any committee, or any gentleman, of his qualification to take the test-oath. I felt it my duty to make this explanation in behalf of my colleague.

Mr. DAVIS. The discussion this morning has still adhered to the modern idea that "loyalty" and "Republicanism" are synonyms.

Mr. STEWART. That is true.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from Nevada has no doubt of the truth of that proposition, because, I suppose, he has not enough intellect to comprehend the falsehood of it. [Laughter.] But this is mere playfulness. I pay all due respect to my friend's intellect. I acknowledge it. I acknowledge that he is a lawyer, a man of mind, and that he is a man of much interest in argument, and often speaks to my instruction. I did not intend him any discourtesy.

But, sir, we are now engaged in the debate of a sort of illegitimate interlude in our legislative history. The honorable Senator from Oregon, as is his wont, has addressed himself to this subject, as he does to all others, with the precision of a lawyer, and a good lawyer. He speaks of trying the title of these gentlemen to their seats as though the question were to be decided in a court of justice. If my honorable friend would pursue his thoughts and determine in his own mind to test and decide the question by the principles of the Constitution and law, his strong sense and his clear legal knowledge would lead him inevitably to the conclusion that neither of these gentlemen has any right whatever to a seat. Being myself firmly impressed with the truth of this position, I regard this whole affair as sort of Kilkenny-cat fight, and I could wish, metaphorically and politically, that it would have just about the same termination as that famous encounter. [Laughter.]

I agree with the honorable Senator from Oregon in part, that in this preliminary inquiry there are only three propositions for the judgment of the Senate. The first is the qualifications of the gentleman who claims the senatorial seat. Another one, I conceive, is the fact of an election by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina. Whenever the inquiry is so far pursued that you come to an election by the Legislature of that State, or a body that is acting as the Legislature of that State, and you ascertain that they have voted and made an election, in this preliminary inquiry certainly, you cannot pursue the matter any further; and you must, as a matter of right, admit the party who comes here with his return where it is shown that the election has taken place in conformity with the evidence furnished by that return.

I am very much surprised, though, at the sensitiveness of gentlemen upon this subject of running the blockade or illicit traffic on the part of one of these gentlemen during the late troubles. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] told us three or four years ago that there were Yankees in the southern States who had recommenced the slave trade, and were engaged in the renewal of that infamous traffic, and he invoked the action of the Senate with a view to arrest it. I was reading a few days ago the report of the testimony taken by a joint committee of Congress, and it was proved by evidence taken before that committee, if I recollect aright, that a notorious general of the Union Army and his brother, during the late war, had been engaged in the city of New Orleans in trading with the enemy beyond the lines. I have been informed upon authority which I cannot doubt, that that same notorious general, the hero of Big Bethel and of Wilmington, while he was in military command in the neighborhood of Richmond, was engaged in carrying on an illicit traffic with the enemy across the lines; and I have no more doubt of the truth of that charge than that I am now addressing the Senate; and I have no doubt that if the Senate would give a fair, independent, vigilant committee, who would investigate the whole truth of the charge against this notorious general, they would establish that charge in hundreds of instances. Why, then, are Senators so sensitive in relation to blockade running and trading with the enemy when it is imputed against one of the claimants of a seat in the Senate from the State of South Carolina?

My honorable friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, in giving us a short sketch of this gentleman, his life and character, spoke of him in such equivocal terms as related to his residence, that I was induced to inquire whether now he was a resident of South Carolina or of Massachusetts? My honorable friend assures me that at this present writing he is a resident of the State of South Carolina. But the proofs and affidavits in this case disclose these facts: during the war and for some years of the war this gentleman had a sort of dual residence; he was alternating between Charleston and Massachusetts. In Charleston he was engaged as the superintendent of public schools or held some office connected with the educational interests of that city. In addition to that, he had taken shares in a blockade runner. I suppose no gentleman who has heard the evidence read doubts that he was concerned in blockade running, and received a portion of the profits. In the exercise of the full right of his dual residence he vibrates between Charleston and Massachusetts, and in the last presidential election we see him figuring, as a resident of the State of Massachusetts, in favor of the late lamented President of the United States, who was then a candidate for reelection.

Does the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who based a resolution some years ago in the Senate upon the fact that the Yankee traders in the South had reopened the slave trade, expect that these keen trading men can go to the South, in war or in peace, and have an opportunity of entering into blockade running enterprises, and making large profits, and can find it in their natures to refrain from participating in such remunerative traffic? It may not be so; but I cannot doubt that this gentleman, who wants now to take a seat in the Senate, and be qualified as a member of the Senate, was concerned in blockade running during the late war. But when there are so many illustrious examples of the same character in Congress and out of Congress, in the House and out of the House, it seems to me it is a little too particular for Senators to take exception to this case. They might as well swallow this as other cases that have been swallowed.

But whether they choose to do so or not, I agree with the legal, constitutional position assumed by Senators in relation to this subject, and especially by the Senator from Oregon, that a matter of that kind cannot be inquired into on the preliminary question whether a man who has the proper legal returns of election to the Senate from a State shall take his seat or not. Whether it will be subsequently inquired into with a view to action of the Senate, which should result in the expulsion of the Senator, is a question upon which I venture no opinion; but it is wholly irregular and incompetent to enter upon that inquiry at this time. If I had not come to the conclusion that neither of these Senators was entitled to a seat I would unquestionably say that the present applicant ought to be admitted, and ought to be allowed to take the oath and his seat on the floor of the Senate; but I believe they are both interlopers; that neither of them has any right whatever to a seat; and that the time will come when both of them will be expelled if they are both admitted.

Mr. CONNESS. I only rise to say that I think it is time this habit of denouncing a distinguished member of the other House of Congress had ceased here. My friend from Kentucky might have discussed this question without indulging in those reflections upon the character of that gentleman. I do think it is not within the rules to do so; and certainly it is not within the rules of good taste. Whether General BUTLER gained laurels at Big Bethel or Wilmington or not, it is true that in the estimation of the loyal people of this country he did win laurels in support of the nation against those who attacked it. It is true that he did that to such an extent as to secure for himself the constant and persistent attacks of those who are and were rebels; and I am very sorry to find the honorable Senator from Kentucky indulging with them in these denunciations upon every occasion that he has an opportunity. If he would even divide his time, and indulge a portion of the time in denunciations of Wade Hampton and Forrest, and other rebels who violated the laws of war as well as attacked their country, it might have some show of fairness, to say the least of it; but this seeking every opportunity to attack men who, it must be said, did the most they could for their country in its greatest need, is hardly in good taste.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator from California is a most perfect pink of all the courtesies of life. He had better pull the beam out of his own eye before he attempts to pluck the mote out of mine. How often and to what extent and to what degree of violence and grossness does he indulge in denunciations of the President of the United States? Sir, I have indulged in no invective against General BUTLER. I have only stated facts. I have often stated those facts in the Senate, and I have often professed my willingness and readiness and desire to make them good if a committee was allowed me. I repeat the proposition. Let the honorable Senator and his friends who constitute the majority, if they want those reflections upon General BUTLER investigated and brought to the truth of evidence, allow an independent committee. I proposed that three or four years ago again and again, and it was always and perseveringly withheld. I do not acknowledge the right of the honorable Senator, and I do not intend to allow him, deliberately to lecture me here. I give him now to understand that I have indulged in no opprobrious language against General BUTLER; I have referred to facts that were dishonorable, degrading, disgraceful in the highest degree to the man and to the service of the country, and I offered to make them good and I will make them good whenever this Senate will give me a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to refer these documents to the Committee on the Judiciary with power to send for persons and papers to investigate them.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should have said nothing on this question if the yeas and nays had not been called for, and I should not vote as I shall feel compelled to vote if this were a new question in the Senate. But it has been presented here a number of times, and the Senate has taken action in these cases, and I think we ought to pursue a consistent course in regard to them. We ought not to decide one way to-day and differently to-morrow. I regret very much to give any vote that will bring this matter before the Committee on the Judiciary; for if there is any thankless business a member of this body has to perform, it is that connected with the investigation of the right of members to their seats.

But, Mr. President, we have acted upon cases, it seems to me, analogous in every respect to the one under consideration. I cannot see the distinction between this case and that of Mr. Thomas, of Maryland. Mr. Thomas was elected by the State of Maryland a Senator, and came here with credentials properly certified. He was the choice of that State.

Maryland had a right to elect a Senator, had a right to choose whom she thought proper as her Senator, so that he possessed the qualifications required by the Constitution of the United States. Nobody denied that Mr. Thomas possessed all those qualifications; but it was alleged that he had been disloyal, and in consequence of those allegations a motion was made to refer his credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary. The matter was discussed in this body. It was not decided hastily and informally, but quite a protracted discussion took place, and at the close of it the credentials were referred to that committee, and an investigation took place, which resulted, as all know, in a decision by the Senate that Mr. Thomas was not entitled to a seat, and he never was sworn in as a member of the body.

Now, sir, there are presented here the credentials of a gentleman from South Carolina, a State which is entitled to representation in this body, the choice of that State as her representative, the gentleman possessing, as did Mr. Thomas, so far as I understand, all the qualifications required by the Constitution of the United States for membership upon this floor; but it is alleged that this gentleman has been engaged in giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and a motion is made to refer his credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary. I cannot distinguish this case from the other. Certainly here is enough to raise the question upon. It is quite as strong a case, in my opinion, as that presented against Mr. Thomas in the first instance. Here are statements, backed by affidavits, making distinct allegations. Although as a new question I should feel disposed to allow this gentleman to be sworn in the first instance and investigate the case afterward, yet the Senate, having adopted the other practice in other cases, I shall feel constrained to vote to refer these credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORTON. I simply desire to say a word in explanation of the vote I shall give. I voted to refer the case of Mr. Thomas to the Committee on the Judiciary. I did that because I believed that a charge of disloyalty, a charge which showed that he could not honestly take the iron-clad oath, ought to be investigated before he was allowed to take it; that a charge of disloyalty ought to be investigated before the person entered the Senate, that after he come in it would be too late. I shall vote for the sake of being consistent, and believing that the principle is right, to refer these credentials to the committee, not because I do not believe Mr. Sawyer is not entitled to admission here—from what I have heard I am prepossessed in his favor—but I believe the Senate ought to be consistent. I want to be consistent myself. I believe that whenever there is a serious charge of disloyalty preferred, going to show that the applicant for admission cannot honestly take the iron-clad oath, that charge ought to be investigated in advance, and not wait until the person is upon the floor of the Senate and clothed with the power of a Senator. This is what the Senate decided before, and it is what I think it ought to decide now, to be consistent.

Mr. DRAKE. There is one very strong reason why the Senate should be consistent, and that is, that the majority of this body should not lay itself open to the charge of sending the credentials of a Democratic Senator to the committee, and then refuse to send the credentials of a Republican Senator there, against whom the same charges are made. Sir, if it is right to do it in one case it is right to do it in another. It would be, in my opinion, unworthy of a Senate containing so large a majority of Republicans as this does to send the case of Mr. Thomas to the Judiciary Committee without an affidavit, as I believe was the case, of any kind charging him with any offense, when he was a Democrat, and the same Senate refuse to send the case now before us to the same committee when allegations are made upon oath with regard to the past acts of the individual.

Mr. HOWE. I conceive that there may be some reason why the Senate should be consistent, and I have no objection to their being so if they can. But there is a new idea, a new interpretation of the Thomas case started here by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana. If the Thomas case established the rule for which they now contend I did not understand it when the Thomas case was voted upon. I understand it to have established this rule: that the seal of a State amounts to nothing, not even to a prima facie case, when there is a charge of blockade running, or what is more indefinite than that, a charge of disloyalty; that the prima facie case is the allegation of any blackguard or vagabond or anything in the shape of a man who can put his name to an affidavit. That is the prima facie case and excludes a man.

Your Constitution makes this body, in express terms, the judge of who is or who is not elected in fact to a seat on this floor. But the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] reminded me just now, and he was corroborated by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] that the universal practice of the Senate has been to regard the certificate of the State, the broad seal of the State, as prima facie evidence upon the question of election, and so to admit the Senator upon that certificate to his seat and allow him to hold it pending that investigation. I have said before, and I say again, there is nothing in the Constitution that I ever saw which makes this Senate the triers of a question of blockade running, or the triers of a question of disloyalty as such; but the Senate has ruled otherwise and have undertaken to constitute themselves the triers of that question. Are they more the triers of that question than they are the triers of a question of election? And if not more, why do you reverse your rule with regard to a question of election? Why do you not hold the certificate of the State prima facie evidence of the qualifications as you do hold it prima facie evidence of the question of election?

I only suppose this to be established in the Thomas case: that there was, in the discretion of the Senate, authority to refer credentials when a case was made out which the Senate adjudged required them to do so. But I did not suppose the Thomas case went to the extent of asserting that when anybody sent a suggestion here or an affidavit that should be received as prima facie evidence of disqualification, and exclude the certified member from his seat pending the trial. I think that is carrying the Thomas case too far. I supposed in that case the Senate saw in the protest sufficient evidence to satisfy themselves that the question of his loyalty ought to be tried before he was admitted to his seat, and in the exercise of that discretion they referred the credentials to the Judiciary Committee. If the Senate hold that there is presented here evidence enough of the disloyalty or of the criminality of Mr. Sawyer to outweigh the certificate of his State, of its Governor, and of its Legislature, then, I suppose, consistently with the ruling in the Thomas case, they should vote to refer it to the Judiciary Committee. I do not think the remonstrance is of as much authority as the certificate of the State, and therefore I shall vote against referring the credentials, and vote to allow the man to take his seat.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There certainly is no question of consistency in the vote we are about to give. We are not affected in any degree by the action in the Thomas case. Every case that is presented here is to be judged of by itself. If a Senator comes here with the proper certificate prima facie he is entitled to a seat. But a case may be made out against him so strong that we may refuse to permit him to take the oath, and refer it for investigation. For instance, if John C. Breckinridge or Jefferson Davis should be returned here, who would permit them to take the oath? It would be referred. Therefore, inasmuch as every case is to be judged of by itself, the question of consistency does not arise, and we are in no way affected by the decision which was made in the Thomas case. I certainly hope that no Senator would be influenced by the consideration of the political views entertained by this Senator. I trust that no one was so influenced in his judgment in the vote he gave in the Thomas case. I know I was not; and I trust no one will be here. That matter is not worthy of our consideration.

Mr. CRAGIN. I shall vote against referring this question to the Judiciary Committee, and I wish to state a few reasons for my vote. Probably I am as well acquainted with the facts and circumstances connected with Mr. Sawyer as any Senator on this floor. He went from my State to South Carolina in 1859, and with the exception of about four months he has been domiciled there ever since; and those four months were in 1864 when he escaped and went to New England, and there stumped several of the New England States, more or less, for the reelection of Abraham Lincoln. Is there anything in that parallel with the case of Thomas of Maryland, whose credentials were referred to the Judiciary Committee? Not at all. I have it within my personal knowledge, and from friends whom I know to be truthful, that all the time Mr. Sawyer was in Charleston during the rebellion he was a warm, earnest, devoted friend of the Union. I know that in 1863, during the darkest hours of the war, he wrote private letters, and got them through the lines in some way, to friends in New Hampshire and elsewhere urging them to remain firm, to have courage, that the rebellion was about tottering, and would fall to the ground. I know that of my own knowledge. Since the passage of the reconstruction acts he has been a leading advocate for reconstruction. By his pen, by his money, by everything that God has given him, he has devoted himself to reconstruction, and has worked earnestly and zealously. These charges that are made against him here to-day are charges that have been trumped up since his election or the day before to defeat him. He is as loyal a man as sits in this Chamber. I hope the case will not be referred to the Judiciary Committee, but that he may now be admitted to take the oath.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I listened with a great deal of interest to the very able argument made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] on the Thomas case to establish the proposition that where charges like these are preferred they ought not to be then considered, but the party ought to be admitted to his seat and the charges afterward investigated. I was not able to take that view of the subject at that time. Whatever views I may entertain in regard to the act of 1862, I cannot agree that a man shall come into this body and take what upon its face appears to be a false oath as a claim to his seat. If this party be guilty of the things charged in the remonstrance, then, taking the oath, he would have to swear falsely. I could not give any vote that would favor a false oath, even if that oath ought not to be required of him.

This case is much stronger, in my judgment, than the case of Governor Thomas. Senators will recollect that the case of Governor Thomas was referred to the Judiciary Committee upon the charge mainly of having made an imprudent speech on the night of his nomination to the office. Afterward, it came to the knowledge of the committee, as I recollect the facts, by a letter, that he had given his son $100 to enable him to go into the southern service. That, I think, was not known to the Senate at the time the case was referred to the Judiciary Committee. My recollection is that the case was referred to that committee only on the charge of an imprudent speech made on the night of his nomination, in which he called in question the conduct and propriety of the organization of Congress, as was alleged, and that, I think, without any statement supported by oath of any party.

I am for standing by the precedent established in that case. If this party is not in a condition truthfully to take the oath then he ought not to take it; and I can see no objection to making the inquiry in this case, as it was made in the other. The statement that the session is about to close certainly cannot control us. The objection to a man's right to a seat is not to be waived because we are approaching the close of the session. It is not probable that the majority here cannot manage without him during the few days that are remaining of this session, and even if he should be delayed his seat until the next session of Congress probably he would not lose his participation in legislation to a greater extent than must occur in all contested cases. Mr. Thomas's case, upon the weakest possible evidence in the world, was sent to the committee, although for the time being the voice of Maryland was not heard through her representative on this floor. Now, that argument ought not to have weight, as it did not have weight with Senators in that case.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall say nothing, sir, to prejudice this case. I would not in advance say one word that could have any such interpretation. Mr. Sawyer, as I understand, is from Massachusetts, and went from there to South Carolina, and now comes back with her honors and trusts. No one on this floor would be more proud to welcome him than a Senator from Massachusetts; but I am not left in this case to be governed merely by my personal desires, or by any pride that I may have in the State to which I belong. I must meet this case on the evidence before the Senate and on the precedents which the Senate has already established.

So far as I understand the case it divides itself into two parts, one of which certainly furnishes no grounds for any exclusion of Mr. Sawyer previous to the inquiry by the committee; the other, I must respectfully submit to the Senate, does furnish ground for such an exclusion. The first part to which I refer is that which is founded on the alleged incompetency of certain members of the Legislature. I am not ready to go so far as the Senator from New York, and say that that is not a fit subject of inquiry for the Senate. I am inclined to think it is; but I agree with the Senator from New York and with other Senators in saying that it is not a sufficient ground for the exclusion of the Senator from taking the oath at this time previous to an inquiry by a committee.

Sir, on this point I have a historical reminiscence. The day that I myself first entered the Senate Chamber, Henry Clay was sitting in the Senate Chamber for the last time. The seat he occupied in the other Hall corresponded to that which is now occupied by my friend the new Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. McDONALD,] and the question that arose was on the credentials of a Senator from Florida, whom it was proposed to exclude from taking the oath at the time. Mr. Clay rose from that seat, leaving it he descended to where the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FERRY] now sits, and he there with vehement eloquence, the last time he ever spoke in this Chamber, insisted that no such question could be raised; that the Senator who had the credentials with the great seal of the State was entitled to be sworn. His influence, his argument, his powerful authority prevailed, and Mr. Mallory, of Florida, for the first time took his seat on this floor.

Now, sir, that case is completely applicable to one branch of this inquiry, that which is founded, as I have already said, on the alleged incompetency of certain members of the Legislature. We cannot now go into that. If there was nothing else, Mr. Sawyer must go to your desk and take the oaths. He has his credentials with the great seal of the State.

There is only one ground on which we can go behind that great seal, and that is the ground which has been so repeatedly recognized in the Senate since our unhappy civil war. It is the ground of loyalty. On that question we can go behind the great seal of the State. Ay, sir, if that question is raised, we must go behind the great seal of the State. Now, here is my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE:] I know how strongly he espouses the other side. I remember well when we were considering the case of Mr. Thomas that he more than once declared that if Jefferson Davis should come into this Chamber with a proper commission from his State he would admit him to be sworn; and it is natural, therefore, that he should apply that principle to the present case. The greater contains the less. If the Senator would admit Jefferson Davis with the great seal of a State to be sworn as a Senator, a fortiori, he would admit another person against whom there was only the objection that he had been a blockade runner.

That brings me to the precise nature of this objection. Here, again, let me say I do not mean to express any opinion on the facts. I know nothing about them beyond what has been read at the desk; but on those affidavits it seems to me there is a case sufficient to put the Senate on inquiry; and that is all that is needed. There are affidavits alleging that Mr. Sawyer was engaged in these illicit transactions, and there is a further tender of evidence, to the amount of twelve or fifteen witnesses, it is said, who will testify to these facts. All this may be an exaggeration; it may be a misrepresentation; but there is this in the form of affidavit on your table; and I know no other way to dispose of it than by referring it to a committee with full power to send for persons and papers in order to report on the facts. If on the inquiry it shall be found that these affidavits are entirely without support, that there is no ground to suspect the participation of Mr. Sawyer in these illicit transactions, then how gladly shall we all welcome him. And I may say that I confidently look for such a report from the committee. But it does seem to me that we are not now at liberty to take into consideration general statements with regard to the political opinions or political services of this gentleman. We must confine ourselves to the precise question before us, or the affidavits, nor more nor less.

Mr. TIPTON. From what has already been elicited in this case, I believe that the Senator who presents himself here for admission is as loyal as I am; and I think I am loyal enough for all practical purposes. So far as politics are concerned, he is as true a Republican as I am. I believe that whatever there is here against him is matter of rivalry, and that there is nothing in it. Therefore, I have no trouble whatever and I am not trammelled by any precedents on this subject. I am utterly astonished at the opposition that is made here. In all my meditations on the subject I fancied, years ago, during the progress of the war, that it would be enough to live for, if I should be permitted to have an opportunity of witnessing, not as a member of this body, but as a citizen of the United States, the return of Senators from the States so recently in rebellion. I supposed that their return would invoke a degree of enthusiasm and ardor and extending of hands and opening of hearts, and an utterance on our part that would show that the consummation was one which was worthy to have received a treasure of money and a treasure of love. And now we stand here and higgie, when South Carolina, the first to leave us, and one of the last to return, presents herself, and we ask for precedents, forsooth. Sir, I scorn the position. I stand here, therefore, heartily and freely and devotedly to welcome this additional representative from South Carolina, and the country and the Republican party of this nation will respond to our action, and will be so shocked at our standing upon fancied precedents in such an hour as this.

Mr. WILSON. I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the Senator from Michigan to modify his motion and leave it simply a motion to refer the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary. If the Committee on the Judiciary desires to send for persons and papers, to send for persons who are absent from the city they can ask leave to do it, and we shall readily grant it. Mr. Sawyer is here to speak for himself. There are Representatives here from South Carolina; there are persons here from Charleston; and perhaps the persons present in the city may be all whom it will be necessary to examine on the subject. Perhaps the consistency of the Senate in the past, and the anxiety of what may be in the future, will determine the Senate to refer this question. So far as I am personally concerned, I have undoubting confidence not only in the loyalty of Mr. Sawyer, but that he is a gentleman of honor and personal character.

Mr. HOWARD. I accept the amendment of my resolution as suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, leaving out the words "with power to send for persons and papers."

Mr. POMEROY. Let the resolution be read as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no resolution offered. It is simply, as modified, a motion to refer the credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Under ordinary circumstances I should not vote to refer a question of this kind to the Judiciary Committee simply because some person had alleged that a Senator duly elected ought not to take his seat; for if he appears here with the credentials and certificate of his State, that is prima facie evidence of his being entitled to the seat. But, sir, there is something more in this than in an ordinary case. The files of the Senate show that another person, Benjamin F. Perry, was elected for this same term, ending on the 4th of March, 1871.

In 1862, while the war was still going on, Congress authorized the President to proclaim amnesty and pardon to persons who were participating in the existing rebellion in any State or part of a State, with such exceptions and at such times, and on such conditions as he might deem expedient for the public welfare. Pursuant to this authority and the authority of the Constitution of the United States, which clothed him as Commander-in-Chief with the power to make peace in the States, the President of the United States, after the close of the rebellion, made his proclamation of amnesty to the people of South Carolina and the people of the other States which had been in insurrection; and after this proclamation of pardon and amnesty which plighted to those men the faith of this Government, which neither Congress nor the President nor the Supreme Court nor any other power on earth has a right to take away, the people of South Carolina reorganized their government as they had a right to do under the Constitution of the United States. In pursuance of that reorganization they elected, as appears by the certificate on the files of the Senate under the seal of the State of South Carolina, Benjamin F. Perry to this place. That certificate is in the language following:

The State of South Carolina:

By his Excellency James L. Orr, Governor and commander-in-chief in and over the State aforesaid, to Benjamin F. Perry:

Whereas the senate and house of representatives of the State aforesaid did by their joint voting, in the chamber of representatives, on the 30th day of October, A. D. 1865, duly elect you, the said Benjamin F. Perry, Senator in the Congress of the United States of America;

Now be it known that, in pursuance of said election, I have commissioned, and by these presents do commission you, the said Benjamin F. Perry, Senator in the Congress of the United States of America.

This commission to continue in force until the 4th day of March, 1871.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the State in the city of Columbia, this 30th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1865, and in the ninetieth year of the independence of the United States of America.

JAMES L. ORR,
Governor of the State.

By the Governor:
W. R. HUNT, Secretary of State.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask my friend whether that B. F. Perry is not the same who was commissioner of impressments in the rebel service?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is Benjamin F. Perry, of South Carolina.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the man.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The point which I make, and the ground only upon which I vote to refer, is that the question has arisen—I know there are gentlemen in the Senate who take a different view of this question from what I do—and it should be referred to the committee, and the committee should pass upon it, which of these two gentlemen is entitled to the seat. This record shows that Benjamin F. Perry is entitled to the seat; but the credentials which are now presented seem to show that another gentleman is entitled to the seat; and therefore the conflict which arises between these certificates from the State of South Carolina as to which gentleman is entitled to take the seat in this body is a question which should be referred to the Judiciary Committee and determined by that committee, and reported to the Senate.

Mr. President, I have said thus much to show that I am not inconsistent in voting for the reference of this case, although in the case of Mr. Thomas, or in the case of any one else, when it does not appear that any other person claims the seat, the seal of the State is with me prima facie evidence that he is properly elected, and I should not vote for the reference in the first instance, but allow him to take the oath; and then if any question arose as to the regularity of the election I would allow it to be disposed of afterward by the committee.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to this new habit which has grown up in the Senate within the last few months, of catechising every Senator who rises to address the Senate, I must say, with all courtesy to my friend, that while I am willing to sit down with him and have a conversation and be questioned on all subjects in reference to this or any other matter, I protest against this practice which has arisen here of late. It is in derogation of the dignity of this body, and is not, I think, the best mode of discussing public questions. If my honorable friend wishes to make a speech I am perfectly willing to hear him.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I do not. I wish merely to ask a question for information. The gentleman can instruct me in relation to it. I wish to ask him whether he regards it as the duty of the Government of the United States to overthrow the present government of South Carolina and establish that under which Mr. Perry received his credentials?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand it to be the duty of this Government to overthrow any State government. The States make their own governments. The Federal Government does not make them for them, and one of the reasons why I protest against this reconstruction of yours is that you have undertaken to enter these States by force of arms and make governments for them, and not allow the people to make them for themselves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on referring the credentials to the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, McCreery, Morton, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Vickers, Whyte, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Cragin, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Williams—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Welch, and Yates—19.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The next step I suppose is to swear in the member-elect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senator-elect be admitted to take the oath with a view to taking his seat in the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The oaths prescribed by law were then administered by the President pro tempore to Mr. SAWYER, and he took his seat in the Senate.

PROPOSED EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate at five o'clock take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening; and I make the motion for the purpose of calling up this evening sundry bills reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, which have been before us for a long time, and on some of which at least I think it the duty of the Senate to act. I make the motion with a view of spending this evening on that business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. POMEROY. That does not displace the motion the Senator from Michigan has made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Michigan is before the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to make a remark on that question. The Senator asks us to come together this evening. That proceeds on the idea that there is to be a speedy adjournment. I do not anticipate any such thing. There is every reason to believe that we must stay here some time longer, if not all the time. If we do stay here some time longer, then in the ordinary course of day sessions we shall be able to attend to all the business that any Senator may be disposed to bring forward. I therefore ask my friend why we should drive business during these hot evenings? Why not take the daylight?

Mr. HOWARD. I will answer the question of the Senator. I would not make this motion under ordinary circumstances; but the situation of my private affairs is such that I shall be compelled to ask leave of absence of the Senate on and after Monday next.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope not.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; and for that reason it is that I am anxious some of these bills may be considered before I find it necessary to leave the city. I hope the Senate will adopt the motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will come to a vote on the question of fixing the day of adjournment before anything further is done. As the Senator from Maine very properly suggests, if we fix a day of adjournment we shall work up to it, and if the Senate be of his opinion, that we ought not to fix any time, we can then work at our leisure. I desire to make this statement to the Senate: by the rules of the House of Representatives it is impossible for a majority of the House to control the order of business, or even two thirds of the House. They cannot move to suspend the rules except on Monday or within the last ten days of the session. Members of the House say that they are embarrassed in the effort to reach bills that are indispensably necessary to be acted on until the two Houses shall have acted upon the question of adjournment. A leading member of the House has just been present urging that we should expedite their business by enabling them to make these motions. I trust, therefore, that the Senate will take up the resolution fixing the day of adjournment. Let it be fixed at any time the majority see proper, and then we can proceed regularly with business. Until that is done I shall oppose any motion for an evening session or any special order. The Senator's motion will amount to a special order. The business now pending is the question of adjournment, and we ought not to lay that aside for the purpose of taking up something else.

Mr. HOWARD. I will not interfere with that.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me I will venture to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that I think his objection a little ungenerous. Senators have come here night after night to consider bills under his charge, and have done it cheerfully; at least I have, and I think the majority of the Senate have, at his request.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me I have no objection to an evening session or to coming here. I do not think any business ought to be made a special order; but I say that we ought to fix the time of adjournment now before further discussion, so as to enable the House to proceed with their business.

Mr. HARLAN. The adoption of this motion will not interfere with the consideration of the Senator's resolution. All that the chairman of the Pacific Railroad Committee asks is that a recess may be had with a view to consider bills from that committee. Of course a majority of the Senate may refuse when we meet, to do it. I hope they may not, however. I hope they will give the chairman the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FERRY in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock to half past seven o'clock this evening, for the purpose of considering bills from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair whether the motion as now stated makes the railroad bills a special order over other business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it does give them priority.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then it requires a two-thirds vote. A bill has to-day come from the House of the highest importance, the funding bill, which must be acted upon, and I trust will take but a few moments. I hope the Senate will not tie itself up in this way.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Michigan, if I understood him, did not ask that those bills, or any one of them, should be made a special order, but he announced that he would attempt to call them up, and he hoped the Senate would consider them.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will modify his motion so as to provide simply for a recess from five o'clock until half past seven, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. POMEROY. This is precisely such an order as was made on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON] that we have an evening session to consider the bill with reference to the bridges on the Ohio. We had such a meeting. This is precisely of that character.

Mr. HOWARD. I make the motion, of course, with the expectation that those bills will receive the attention of the Senate during the evening session. That is my expectation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the motion as now modified. It is that the Senate take a recess from five o'clock until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to suggest to the honorable Senator from Kansas that the distinction is this: in the case of the Senator from Indiana he proposed to take up a public measure, a measure of public and general interest that was pending at the time, and in which there might not be supposed to enter any particular inducement or motive such as enters into a private claim. On the other hand, the proposition now is to take up during an evening session, when we know from experience the Senate will be thin, several bills, and among them, of course, one bill which has been somewhat discussed in the Senate, a private bill, proposing to appropriate a large sum of money and a large amount of land. I submit that there is a very great distinction between the two cases; and I hope that we shall not be compelled to vote upon the particular bill which I speak of, or, indeed, upon any bill giving subsidies to railway companies at this stage of the session unless we can do it at some hour of the day when the whole Senate is likely to be present. It seems to me to select on a night so hot as this an evening session, knowing as we do that at evening sessions when important bills have been considered it has required an effort to keep a technical quorum—to select such an occasion as that for this purpose is giving a grace and granting a favor to a mere private interest which I hope will not be granted. If this money is to be paid and land given to these companies let it be done at least by all the representatives of the States. Do not let us select a time when it is certain to be disposed of by a comparatively small portion of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. I have not announced my purpose to call up the bill to which the honorable Senator has just alluded. What bill I may ask the Senate to take up I do not now mention. But there are several bills reported regularly from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, which have been ready for the action of the Senate for months, and I have from time to time with all the diligence within my command endeavored to call up some of those bills with a view to have them acted upon, either the one way or the other, by the Senate; but not one bill from that committee has been acted upon by the Senate finally during this session, except the one relating to Goat Island, in the harbor of San Francisco.

The Senate have constituted a standing committee on the subject of the Pacific railroad, and charged them with onerous and very important duties from time to time. They have met regularly weekly, sometimes more than once a week, to take these subjects into consideration; and now we are told by the Senator from New York, by implication at least, that after all these railroad bills reported by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad are nothing but private bills, and therefore ought to have the go-by. Now, sir, that is not exactly fair. If the Senate do not intend to consider any of those bills, if they do not intend to make subsidies either in land or money, if they intend to withdraw the supporting hand of the Government from all these enterprises which they have placed under the supervision of one of their standing committees, let them disband the committee, and say "We will act no longer upon any of these subjects." But as long as the committee are continued, and their labors are performed, and additional duties from day to day imposed upon them, I ask, in courtesy and fairness, that their reports shall receive the attention and consideration of the Senate at some time. I have been watching here the whole session to get up some of these important measures, but have been unable to do so up to this time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand the honorable Senator from Michigan to ask us to make anything a special order, but that we have an evening session, and then the Senate will determine for themselves what measures shall be considered. If they think it proper to take up the bills to which he has referred they will take them up; if they think proper to take up something else they will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to take a recess.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the question is taken I wish to say one word. I am perfectly willing to vote for a recess from five o'clock to half past seven after we have acted on the question of adjournment. Then we can decide what kind of business ought to have precedence when we know what time we have to do business in. But now, before we have acted on that subject, before we have fixed the day of adjournment, at this period of the session, to give precedence to any kind of business and devote our time to it may be doing wrong with reference to other business; and I hope we shall not do it until we have settled that question, because the time has arrived when we ought to agree on an adjournment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 18, noes 17.

Mr. FESSENDEN and Mr. CONKLING called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I appeal to the Senator from Michigan to withdraw this motion until we can take a vote on the question of adjournment, and then I will vote with him for an evening session.

Mr. SHERMAN. So will I.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am in favor of evening sessions, but I think there is great force in the suggestions that we ought to fix the time for adjournment, and then work in accordance with the time we have. If the Senate shall decide that we will not take an early adjournment, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, then we shall have abundance of time without night sessions.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not foresee that this will be any interference with our action on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is taking valuable time.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall be content with whatever the Senate sees fit to decide on this question; but I will not withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Kellogg, Morton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Towner, Tipton, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cameron, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Trumbull, Vickers, Wythe, and Williams—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Backalew, Cattell, Chandler, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Harris, Norton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Robertson, Suisbury, Sawyer, Stewart, Wade, Welch, and Yates—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, which is the resolution fixing the day for adjournment.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the unfinished business to be the bill for the protection of American citizens abroad. I am willing, however, that it shall go over informally to have the resolution considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that will come up next after this.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask permission to make a report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the report.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of Captain Jonas P. Levy, for payment of money due him under a treaty of the United States and the Mexican republic, February 2, 1848, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1261) amendatory of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1381) providing for an election in Virginia, reported it without amendment, and recommended that it lie on the table.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the message of the President of the United States of the 14th of July, in reference to the ratification of the fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a report of the Secretary of War, communicating information in relation to the publication of the medical and surgical history of the war, submitted a report, accompanied by the following resolution:

Resolved, That under existing laws the balance of the appropriation of $60,000, made July 28, 1866, for the preparation, under the direction of the Secretary of War, of five thousand copies of the first volume of the medical and surgical history of the rebellion, compiled by the Surgeon General, and the preparation and publication of a like number of the medical statistics of the Provost Marshal General's Bureau, compiled and to be compiled by Surgeon J. H. Baxter, to wit: the sum of $19,736, must be applied exclusively to the latter work.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills of the House:

A bill (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 1376) for the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post roads.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making appropriations of money to carrying into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointed Mr. N. P. BANKS of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM LOUGH RIDGE of Iowa, and Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions, asked a conference on the disagreeing vote of the two Houses thereon, and appointed Mr. S. PERHAM of Maine, Mr. D. POLSLEY of West Virginia, and Mr. WILLIAM LAWRENCE of Ohio, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appointed Mr. THOMAS W. FERRY of Michigan, Mr. JOHN F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, and Mr. J. A. JOHNSON of California, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 638) for the better organization of the district courts of the United States within the State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORY PURCHASED FROM RUSSIA.

On motion by Mr. SUMNER, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and,

On motion by Mr. SUMNER,

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SUMNER, Mr. MORTON, and Mr. DOOLITTLE.

POSTAL LAWS.

On motion by Mr. RAMSEY, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws; disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. RAMSEY,

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. RAMSEY, Mr. HARLAN, and Mr. MCCREERY.

PENSION LAWS.

On motion by Mr. VAN WINKLE, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. VAN WINKLE,

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. VAN WINKLE, Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. FOWLER.

LIBRARY OF AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution which, to be effective, should be passed immediately, and I desire it put upon its passage.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 170) in relation to the library of the Department of Agriculture was read the first time, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. CAMERON. I have but a word to say, and then I am satisfied the Senate will let this resolution pass.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FERRY.) Does the Senator ask for its present consideration?

Mr. CAMERON. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to the consideration of anything until we get rid of the adjournment resolution, which now stands in the way of the business of the two Houses. I shall have no objection to it after that.

Mr. CAMERON. If the Senator will give way for one moment I will satisfy him that this is right. The Agricultural Bureau, as everybody knows, was a portion of the Patent Office for a long while. During the time it was under the direction of the Patent Office there grew up an agricultural library. A new building for agricultural purposes entirely has now been erected, and the Commissioner of Agriculture is about removing his library, but is told by the Commissioner of Patents that it belongs to the Patent Office. All I ask is to give him the authority of Congress to remove it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask if this is in order. We shall never get along unless we proceed regularly with business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is the resolution fixing the adjournment.

Mr. CAMERON. It will not require as much time to pass this resolution as the gentleman has occupied in objecting to it. I hope he will let it go through. I am sure everybody is in favor of it.

Several SENATORS. Let it go.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is no objection, and it is passed without debate, I shall not object.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall regard the library now under his control and in his possession as part of the property of the Department of Agriculture, and that he shall retain it in his charge as directed by section three of the act approved May 15, 1862, establishing a Department of Agriculture.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 232) to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota;

A bill (S. No. 286) to incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America;

A bill (S. No. 357) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming; and

A bill (S. No. 492) to extend the time for the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad in the State of California.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask leave to call up the resolution I offered a few days since with regard to the pay of pages and messengers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object. I am sorry to object to a request of my friend, but there is a resolution now pending, and I should like to have it disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution named by the Senator from Arkansas cannot be considered. The resolution fixing the day of adjournment is before the Senate, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. CONNESS. For the purpose of expediting business and letting this resolution go to the other House, where they will probably materially change it, I withdraw the amendment that I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment being withdrawn, the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, to strike out "Wednesday, the 15th," and to insert "Friday, the 24th;" so that the resolution will read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, adjourn their respective Houses without day on Friday, the 24th of July next, at noon.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved," and inserting:

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 27th of July, at twelve o'clock meridian adjourn their respective Houses until the fourth Monday of September, and on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question will be on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to the original resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to amend that amendment by inserting "Monday, the 27th," instead of "Friday, the 24th."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I will remark that I do not think that even that amendment would make the resolution such as I should be willing to vote for now. I have an amendment which is not unlike that of my colleague, which I propose to offer. I think that we cannot adjourn permanently; we can only take a recess; and I propose in the amendment which I now have in my hand, that we adjourn on Monday at twelve o'clock to the second Wednesday of September, at noon. But my amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. POMEROY. There are two propositions distinctly before the Senate. One is to adjourn, and the other is to take a recess.

Mr. SUMNER. But we cannot get at the question of a recess until we dispose of the intermediate question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] to adjourn on Monday, the 27th.

Mr. SUMNER. That is to amend the pending proposition by substituting Monday instead of Friday. If we are to adjourn I prefer Monday rather than Friday.

Mr. POMEROY. If we are to adjourn it makes no difference whether we adjourn on Friday or Monday; but the question is whether we shall adjourn at all; and by voting down any given day, we are to vote then, if the Senate is of that opinion, for a recess.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall vote for a recess, and wish to get at that question.

Mr. POMEROY. If it is the sentiment of the Senate that we are to have a recess, then let us vote down all propositions of adjournment; it makes no difference what day.

Mr. WILSON. In the present condition of the country I hope we shall do precisely what we did last March a year ago—fix a day on which Congress can come together if the needs of the country require it; if they do not we can stay at home, and the two Presiding Officers can adjourn the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That question is not before the Senate now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] substituting "Monday, the 27th" instead of "Friday, the 24th."

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I shall vote against this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, because if you are going to adjourn these two Houses, either on Friday or Monday, I see no reason why we cannot adjourn just as well on Friday as Monday. I know of no reason that should keep us here from Friday until Monday. For this reason I shall vote against this amendment.

I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] if that motion comes before the Senate. I do not believe we ought to adjourn these two Houses either on Friday or Monday. I do not believe we ought to adjourn these two Houses until the bill which passed here two nights ago shall have become a law, and I do not believe we ought to adjourn the two Houses until one other proposition has been enacted into a law, which is now lying on my table which I propose to offer if I get an opportunity.

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. SUMNER. What is that?

Mr. HOWE. It is a bill entitled "A bill in addition to the several acts providing for suppressing insurrections against the governments of the States." Your Constitution directs Congress to make such provisions, and the only provision which Congress has hitherto made has been in the enactment of a law which authorizes the President to call out the militia or to employ the Army and Navy in case of an insurrection against the government of a State, and when he is called upon either by the Governor or the Legislature; and perforce of those very laws you have constituted the President the judge of who is the Governor of a State, and who is the Legislature, and he has told you over and over again in the most solemn manner that he regards certain men to be Executives and certain bodies to be Legislatures whom your laws practically condemn and ignore.

Now, I do not know whether there is to be an insurrection down there in these States or not; I hope there is to be none; but we have been admonished from various quarters, and in the most solemn manner that such insurrections are imminent. One of the candidates for one of the first offices in the gift of the American people has told us over his signature that he regards it to be the duty of the day to depose the Governors and governments of those States which have been established under your laws, to uproot them entirely. With such a notification before us that such a work is contemplated or is desired, and with this notification from the President that he does not regard those governments as valid, but that he regards other organizations as being the valid governments, for us to adjourn with a law on our statute-book vesting this discretion with the President does not seem to me to be prudent. I hope, therefore, that these two Houses will not adjourn until some new provision is enacted; and then I hope, acting upon the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, they will not adjourn until December, but will adjourn until some day prior to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as the particular day of adjournment is concerned I have no more feeling or interest than any other Senator. I know that since I have been in Congress the business has never been so completely ready for an adjournment forty-eight hours before the adjournment as it is to-day. Every appropriation bill has been passed, as I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. There are bills always pending in Congress, and there always will be; there are many bills that Senators have an interest in; and if we were to sit until we passed all the bills that Senators think are highly important to the public service we should never adjourn at all. I confess it is rather a cool proposition, with the thermometer at ninety-four, to ask us to stay here to pass a bill that has never been proposed until now; that has never been discussed; that has not yet been referred to a committee. I say it is a cool proposition to ask us to stay here until such a measure can be passed through both Houses, and then wait ten days more for a veto.

I know of no bill now among those which are indispensably necessary to carry on the operations of the Government that has not been signed by the President except the tax bill, which, I am told, is upon the President's table, and will probably be signed or disposed of in some way to-day. There is nothing to keep us here, so far as public measures of vital importance are concerned; we could adjourn to-day, but the House of Representatives are tied up by a rule which prevents them from acting on many measures unless the day of adjournment is fixed. According to their rules, within ten days before the final adjournment the rules can be suspended, so that the control of the business is within the power of a majority. Heretofore, before the last year or two, we have always fixed the day of adjournment a month ahead, and that gave the House their full ten days, during which a majority of the House could control its business; might go to the Speaker's table; might take up any bill; might lay aside any bill; but now that cannot be done even by a vote of two thirds, and therefore the very bills that Senators desire them to act upon cannot now be reached. That we can adjourn on Friday, and transact all the business that is necessary to be done, I have not a doubt; but if Senators want to stay here until Monday, in order to pass a multitude of bills which they feel an interest in, perhaps of a private character, or perhaps public bills which they think are very important, well and good.

Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest to my friend that he forgets the executive business. There is business pending in executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe we can dispose of all the business in executive session in four or five hours; but I do not know that. There is one public bill that I desire ten or fifteen minutes' time upon, the funding bill, which the other House has sent back with amendments. I do not know that it will take any time beyond what is required for a simple statement of the question. With that exception I do not know of any general public bills of an important character upon which there is any action of either House required. We could stay here for a month or two; but it seems to me we ought to adjourn.

As to the proposition for a recess, I have no feeling about that. I stand precisely on that question now as I did before. I believe these suddenly called sessions rarely do any good. If the House of Representatives, who are the direct Representatives of the people, deem the state of public affairs in this country so imminent as to provide for the exceptional case of the recess, I am willing to agree to it, and come back here in September or October; but I do not think there is any occasion for it, nor shall I probably vote for it unless the opinion of the House is very decided, and if it were I should yield to them upon that point.

I do not think the Senate ought to provide for such a contingency unless there is strong reason given for it. I know now of no reason of a public character which should compel us to come back here in September. I know of no power that the President can exercise to interfere with the laws that will demand our coming back. If other Senators have fears on that subject, which I have not, or if the House of Representatives insist as a precaution that we should come back in September, let them demand it, and I shall be willing to yield. It will be putting us to a great deal of inconvenience, interrupting us in the campaign that is now more vitally important than the action of Congress. The action of the people this fall in passing judgment upon the candidates and platforms that are submitted to them is vitally important, transcendently more important than the action of Congress upon the multitude of bills that now lie upon our table. My own sense of duty would be best discharged by going home and sharing with the people in the great trial that they are to participate in this fall, and leave until the next session the closing of the business of the Fortieth Congress.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Ohio regards it as rather a cool proposition to ask the Congress of the United States to remain here to enact a law which has not yet, he says, been proposed, has not yet been discussed at all. I do not think any proposition ought to be regarded as cool made in these days, and I particularly dissent from his characterizing this as a cool proposition; and for this reason I have not offered that bill to the Senate up to the present time; I never drew it until this morning, and I never was thoroughly persuaded of the necessity of any legislation upon this subject until yesterday. I had seen this letter from one of the candidates for Vice President before; I had taken notice of the fact that the President of the United States professed to regard those organizations which he had constructed down there in the rebel States as the valid and legal governments of those States, but I supposed that that was a theory with him which he proposed to discuss rather than to act upon; and therefore I did not think it of vital importance that there should be any specific legislative direction to him or to the country in reference to that matter. But yesterday when this question of adjournment was under discussion the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] took occasion to say—and every one who knows him knows he is very careful not to say any more than he means—that he should favor the earliest possible adjournment, and as I understood him assigned as a leading reason why he favored an early day of adjournment that it would aid in defeating a bill which had passed the Senate but the night before, which he characterized as a very bad measure and as a very dangerous one, as a measure threatening bloodshed and civil war.

Now, what was that measure which the cautious Senator from Indiana tells us cannot be enacted into a law without imminent danger of involving the country in bloodshed and in civil strife? It was simply a proposition to distribute certain arms to the militia of the several States. I know of a great many politicians who could tell me that that would lead to bloodshed, and I should not regard it at all; but when a Senator so cautious and so prudent as the Senator from Indiana is known to be, and whose voice is so potential in the United States as his is known to be, tells us that we cannot put arms into the hands of the militia of the several States without involving the country in civil war, I think it is time for the country, for the Senate at least, to stop and ask the reason why. The Senator knows as the Senator knows that it has been the usage of the States from the foundation of the Government to cherish a militia organization. The Senator knows, for he is a lawyer and has read the Constitution, that that Constitution declares such an organization to be essential to the liberty of the States; and the Senator knows, for he has read the Constitution, that that instrument imposes upon Congress the obligation to provide for organizing and arming and disciplining the militia of the States; and he knows, therefore, that this measure which he denounced in such emphatic terms yesterday is but an ordinary measure repeatedly adopted by Congress in the exercise of this plain constitutional charge of legislative duty; and yet now, with the Constitution before him, he tells us we must not proceed to discharge that duty, and why? Because he tells us that an exciting election is at hand.

Why, Mr. President, we have had a great many elections, general elections, presidential elections, since this constitution was enacted. Did it ever happen before that an American Senate was told that they could not put arms into the hands of the militia of the States because a presidential election was pending? Is there more excitement about this election than there has been about many others which have preceded it? If so, I have not seen the evidence of it, and I certainly do not feel the evidences of it. I have seen many elections which interested me more deeply, or at least excited me more than the present one has up to this moment.

Mr. President, the Senator told us that it would not do to put these arms into the hands of the militia, because an election was pending. He went so far as to protest against putting arms into the hands of the militia of that great State which he himself represents here in part. He told us that Indiana did not require these arms, and he argued that it was unsafe to put these arms into the hands of the government of Indiana, and one of the reasons was because the Governor of Indiana was a candidate for reelection. Has it come to this, sir, that the militia of a State can be disbanded and be disbanded whenever the Governor happens to be a candidate for reelection? Does the honorable Senator from Indiana mean to be understood that the election is so exciting in Indiana that the government of that State is like y to be shaken by it? I hope he did not mean to tell the country so. I hope he did not mean to tell the State of Indiana so. I do not know personally the gentleman who happens to be Governor of Indiana. I suppose he was elected by the people of that State, and I suppose him to be, I feel bound to assume that he is, a gentleman of that high character who can be intrusted with the discharge of executive duties even pending an election in which he may be a candidate.

Mr. President, these arms are to go to the governments of the several States, to all the States alike. The Senator asked, with a good deal of emphasis yesterday, why, if we did not mean them to be used in influencing elections, we did not assent to the proposition of the Senator from Maryland and postpone the distribution of them until the 1st of January next. I should have supposed the Senator himself could have conceived the answer to that. To have done so would have been to admit either the purpose or the possibility of these arms being used, of that militia being employed to influence and control these elections. It would have been to admit here on this floor that the character of the governments existing within the several States was of that dubious and uncertain character which called upon the Legislature of the United States to distrust them so far as to withhold the usual complement of arms until after this election has passed over.

For one I could not afford to vote for an amendment which would impute such criminal motives to the government of any one of the States within this Union; and that was the reason why I voted against that proposition to amend.

But, sir, it was not my purpose to argue the measure which was under discussion here two nights ago; it was only my purpose to call attention to the character of it, to show how simple a thing it is in itself, and to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Indiana warns us that that measure, a measure so simple as that cannot be ventured upon at this time without danger of involving the country in civil strife and in bloodshed. Sir, these arms, as I have said, are to be put into the hands of the governments of States, and they will not be used by those governments unless those governments are assaulted. And if those governments are assaulted, then it is the purpose of arming the militia that they should have the means of defending the authority of their own States. It was for that purpose that your Constitution declared that Congress should provide for arming the militia of the several States.

Now, sir, I must insist that I had a right yesterday to take new alarm upon this subject; and it was in view and because of the declarations made yesterday following up those which I had understood to come from other quarters not more respectable at other times, that I saw fit to prepare the bill which is now on my table. Now, the Senator from Ohio says it is a cool proposition to ask Congress to wait and pass that measure now. It is never too late to ask for the enactment of a necessary law. If this is necessary to the protection and security of the country, then it is the duty of Congress to wait here and put it into a law if they can. If it is not necessary, then I admit that Congress ought not to remain here a day for the purpose of passing it. The Senator from Ohio has not undertaken to deny the necessity of the measure; he has not intimated a doubt that the discretion which I spoke of is by your existing law vested in the President. He does not profess any doubt but what the President will act upon his view so often declared in reference to these governments; and unless he feels some assurance which he has not yet expressed or knows some fact which is not known to me which should secure the confidence of the country, I hope he will not insist that these two Houses shall adjourn until some action shall be taken upon the proposition to which I have referred.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I do not intend to extend this debate, and I shall ask the attention of the Senate but for a few minutes. Upon the bill to which I referred yesterday I expressed my opinions decidedly, and I have seen no reason to change the views I then expressed. The Senator from Ohio felt himself authorized to say that I had spoken out of time and out of place. The Senate is the proper place for me to express my views upon any important measure here presented, whether I think its tendency is to promote the public welfare, or whether, in my judgment, it is dangerous to the public peace. As to the time when I shall address the Senate, I must beg permission of the Senator from Ohio to judge of that for myself. I did not introduce this subject into the Senate. The Senator from Kansas, [Mr. POMEROY], the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD], and, I believe, the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. DRAKE], all alluded to the bill which had passed the night before, and spoke of it as being of such great importance to the country that no adjournment ought to take place until it had become a law. This introduced into the body that bill for discussion and consideration. The Senator from Ohio, perhaps, by virtue of his position with the majority, may have the right to say that the introduction of that subject by those three Senators was out of time and out of place; they may recognize his authority thus to criticize their conduct; but for myself I dispute his right to say that it was out of time and out of place for me to address the Senate as I chose to address it upon that question yesterday, especially as what I said was in reply to Senators on the other side.

Allusion was made to the fact that I was not here when the bill passed. On the night when this bill was considered I was not in good health, and did not suppose that the custom and usage of the Senate to consider ordinary matters would be departed from, and extraordinary measures be pressed upon its consideration. Therefore I was not here. But, sir, when the bill came before the Senate again by the argument of the honorable Senators I have mentioned, it was not only my right, but, in my judgment, an imperative duty at the very first opportunity I could command, to admonish the country of the danger to the public peace that was involved, as I thought, in the passage of the bill.

The Senator from Ohio said that this bill did not change existing laws, but that such a distribution of arms can be made under existing laws. Sir, I am aware of the existence of a law under which from year to year arms are distributed among the States; and if this bill makes no change in the law why does the Senator from Ohio say that in order to make it a law he will stay here during the heat of summer and the cold of winter along with the President? Sir, if it be a measure of such importance in the judgment of the Senator, it must in some respect change existing law; and, as I think, it does depart from existing law in two respects. First, in regard to the number of arms that are to be distributed among the States, and in the next place it is palpable that no law heretofore existing enabled the Governors of any States to arm one political party against another. In that respect it is an innovation upon the legislation of the country.

The Senator referred again to the reports of outrages in the southern States. That story has been repeated in the Senate and elsewhere without evidence in its support until it has ceased to be valuable as a political appeal. The country understands that now; it has ceased to be sensational any more. The Senator from Ohio referred to the extraordinary statement communicated from the convention of Texas by the Senator from West Virginia; and that is an argument here, that it is stated that nine hundred people have been murdered in the State of Texas! That is an argument to pass this bill, and Texas is one of the three States that are not provided for in the bill itself. The most shocking state of society is proven to exist in the State of Texas, it is claimed, worse, perhaps, than in any of the States; and yet Texas is excluded from the bill, and why? If there is more disorder in Texas than elsewhere, if arms are to be distributed to maintain the public peace, and for no other purpose, and it be shown to you by sufficient evidence that Texas is in a worse condition than any of the States, why is Texas omitted from the bill? Why, except that there is no election to take place in Texas this fall?

Again, reference is made to the case of the murder of one man in the State of Georgia. Now, sir, it is not proper for me to discuss that case. Extraordinary things have been announced over the country in regard to that case. I hope one half we have heard is not true; and it is hardly proper that it should be discussed while the trial is going on. And a very wonderful trial it is! After the State has been reconstructed, as it is claimed, after the Legislature is in session, after the courts are supposed again to be clothed with their authority in that State, a crime is being tried by a military commission or court-martial. Sir, I will not discuss that case.

But, sir, the principal purpose I had in speaking now at all was to reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, that I spoke by authority. I did not assume to speak by authority; and when I did not assume to speak by authority I question the right of any Senator to say that I so spoke for the President. I undertook to express no views of the President. I did not assume to know what his views were. I expressed very earnestly my own judgment, a judgment from which I do not expect to depart: that it is the right and the duty of the President to defeat that bill by any means within his power under the Constitution. I did not say that the President contemplated a veto or a withholding of the bill or a signing of the bill; and therefore the Senator from Ohio was not authorized in saying that I spoke by authority.

In my humble judgment, the Senator from Ohio has much more intimate relations with this Administration than I am honored with; not, perhaps, directly to the President, but through the Treasury Department, owing, no doubt, to his position at the head of the Finance Committee of this body. For myself I am not responsible for what the President does, and he is not responsible for what I choose to say. I have not seen that distinguished officer for more than six weeks. I am not honored with his confidence, and I do not obtrude my views upon him.

I saw in one of the papers this morning—my attention was called to it—a statement that within a few hours before I addressed the Senate yesterday I had been in consultation with the President, and had no doubt expressed his views. I am glad that there are some newspapers that do not command public confidence, and therefore neither I nor the President can be hurt by statements of that sort. I repeat, sir, in answer to anything of that sort, that I have not had the honor of an interview with the President for more than six weeks past. I did not have occasion to call upon him, and he had no occasion, I presume, to ask my views upon any subject.

The same paper says that I declared it to be the view of the President that these reconstructed States are not to be respected or regarded as States by the Executive. I expressed no opinion upon that at all. I did not discuss that subject. I did not allude to it. I confined myself to the simple proposition that you were enacting a law whereby one political party might be armed as against another; and that you insisted that that arming should take place before the presidential election came round. That was the subject of my argument, and I did not go outside of it yesterday. What the President's views of his duty in regard to these southern States are I have no information beyond that in the possession of any other Senator. His views as expressed in his veto are known to you as well as to me. And I do not undertake upon that or any other subject to express his opinions, or to declare his purposes. While I respect his high office, while I support him in his policy in regard to the southern States, which has always recognized them as States in the Union, only awaiting the restoration of their practical relations to the Government, I am in no sense his representative in this body. I leave that, if it be necessary, to the Senators who contributed to his election.

Mr. President, having placed the President right on this question, so far as an attempt has been made to hold him responsible for my views, I have done now to-day all that I desired. I have no modification of the views I expressed yesterday to make; and I repeat the hope that that bill may never become a law. I hope it will fail in the House of Representatives; I hope if it shall pass the House that it will fail elsewhere, because I consider it dangerous to the public peace, and I am astonished that Senators should speak of threats of violence when they themselves are supporting the only measure that does endanger the public peace.

Mr. MORTON. It is proper perhaps that I should say a word, not so much upon the question of adjournment as upon the question of the distribution of arms. So far as Indiana is concerned she does not need these arms for any purpose of public safety or for any electioneering purpose. Although the present Governor of Indiana is a candidate for reelection, yet if you were to place the whole public arsenals of the United States in his hands it is very certain they would not be used to any extent, and could not be, for the purpose of promoting his election. But, Mr. President, it having been the policy of this Government to distribute arms at stated periods to all the States in this Union, though they were at perfect peace with themselves and with the whole country, it need not excite any suspicion or create any feelings of uneasiness that arms should be sent to Indiana along with other States.

But, Mr. President, the argument adduced against this distribution of arms by my honorable colleague is that they will be used in the southern States especially for electioneering purposes to carry an election; and it is described as arming one political party against another. Is it arming a political party to arm a State government? Is that the effect always? We have always armed State governments. Can it be said with propriety that we are thereby arming a political party? It is true that that State government will be in the hands, perhaps, of one party or of another; but we must arm State governments and legal organizations. We cannot arm the mob or arm a party. So far from these arms being sent for electioneering purposes, or to carry an election, or to arm one party against another, the simple truth is that these arms ought to be sent to the reconstructed States for the purpose of protecting the State governments against revolution and destruction. They are threatened, and they are threatened boldly, with revolution. We have erected them, but so far we have not protected them. We have built them up, and to this time we have left them unprotected in the midst of their armed enemies. Sir, if it is right to have State governments at all it is right to protect them against their enemies, let them come from what party they may come.

Now, Mr. President, what is the actual state of the case in the reconstructed States? I have just inquired of the Senators recently admitted from these States, and they all tell me that there is not a musket or a piece of artillery in any of the State arsenals with which those State governments can arm the militia and protect themselves. In other words, they are perfectly unprotected, not only without arms, but without money to buy arms.

Now, sir, what is our duty? They are surrounded by a rebel and a hostile population in great part. The great body of the whites are not only hostile to them, but threatening to revolutionize them. These enemies have recently been in arms. There they are, officers and soldiers together; they can fall in line to-morrow, tried and trained soldiers many of them. These governments are surrounded by a hostile army that has just been disbanded, you may say, and that can come together any moment upon a given signal; and these hostile bands by whom they are surrounded are armed. You cannot find a rebel house hardly in the whole South that does not have its rifle and its musket.

Mr. DRAKE. Will the honorable Senator allow me just there to furnish him with some facts which I have obtained.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly, sir, with pleasure.

Mr. DRAKE. Since the debate here the day before yesterday on this subject, I have made some investigations in regard to the state of facts to which the honorable Senator from Indiana is now referring; and I learned from an officer high in command in the Union Army, who would be as likely to know as any other, that the number of rebels in the field in the last year of the rebellion was about three hundred and fifty thousand. I then made investigation to find out what quantity of small arms the Government of the United States had succeeded in capturing from the rebels, and I find that of every description of small arms, excluding those that were surrendered by Lee, the whole number captured from the fall of Vicksburg to the fall of the rebellion was only one hundred and sixty-seven thousand five hundred and sixty seven. If you add to that the number surrendered by Lee's army and the number picked up on the field of Gettysburg, which probably belonged to the rebel army there, it appears that all descriptions of small arms, probably about two hundred thousand, were taken from the confederacy. Of this number I am not able to say what proportion would probably be muskets; nor have I any information on that point; but I doubt whether more than one half of them. If that should be true, then there were two hundred and fifty thousand rebel soldiers in the rebellion in the last war whose arms have never been got by this Government at all, and they are still in their hands at their homes.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this population is armed, it is trained to war, and it is now crouched in the very attitude of springing upon these governments. Take the southern newspapers; take the declarations of their public speakers; take their expressions in meetings, and we find that they are resolving unanimously that they will not submit to and recognize these State governments. They have not as yet fixed a time for the rising; they have not yet perhaps organized for that purpose; but they have unanimously declared that they will not submit. We cannot ignore this fact.

Then, Mr. President, what are the influences bearing upon them? They are organized into a party; they are members of the Democratic party. That party has declared itself upon the question of the legality of these existing State governments. Take the Democratic press throughout the United States and it is unanimous that these governments have no legal existence in point of law, that the acts of Congress creating them are void, that there being no law to sustain them nobody is bound to yield obedience to them. This is the general teaching of the Democratic party. It was so declared in their convention at New York the other day; and their candidate for Vice President, nominated but a few days after he made the declaration in print, has declared that it is the purpose and faith of the Democratic party, when it comes into power, to overturn these governments by military force; and with that declaration still upon his lips and upon account of it, they put him in nomination. Here, then, is the Democratic party of the North uniting with the rebels of the South in the declaration that these State governments shall be overturned by military force; and, in view of that fact, I ask what reasonable man can object to having these governments armed unless he desires their overthrow. It comes right down to that point that they are threatened with destruction by military force, and we must either protect them or we must subject them to that danger.

Mr. President, the question is asked why do we not send arms to Texas and Virginia and Mississippi. The answer is that there they have no loyal State governments to receive them. Suppose you send arms to Virginia, to whom would you give them? Would you give them to the military government? That is a military government carried on by the Army of the United States; it does not need them. Would you give them to the rebels? They do not need them because they have got arms; and we certainly would not give arms to the rebels; we would only give them to the loyal. As to these three States, the answer is that there is no loyal State government to receive them; the other government being disloyal, illegal, unauthorized, and unrecognized by the Government of the United States.

Now, what is our duty? I am willing that the Senate shall fix a day for the adjournment; but I do submit as a matter of imperative justice to these State governments that we have established, and as a matter of justice and duty to the Union men of the South when they are thus threatened by their enemies, that we should not adjourn until we have placed arms in their hands with which they can defend themselves.

Mr. President, there are a number of the Senators from those States present here this afternoon. I presume they are somewhat modest and diffident as yet, having just come into this body, but they will get over that by and by. I should like to hear from these Senators upon the question of the necessity of sending arms to their State governments. If we adjourn without arming them, we know not what may happen in thirty days or sixty days from this time. Therefore it seems to me that before we shall finally adjourn there ought to be provision made for arming these State governments, not to carry elections, but to protect themselves against a revolution threatened by the Democracy both North and South. If it is expensive to arm these State governments let the responsibility rest upon those who have made it necessary.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I regard the question under consideration as one of much more than ordinary importance. On two former occasions when we had a similar question under consideration I took ground in opposition to what turned out to be the view of the majority of the Senate by their vote, but at that time I undertook to prophesy, and I believe the prophecy I then indulged in was soon history, and I believe that the prophecy I now indulge in will be history if the same course is pursued on this occasion.

To my mind, since the surrender of the rebel armies, the country has never been in as critical a condition as it is at this moment. There is a large, organized, thoroughly drilled party—a portion of them, I may say the leading portion, drilled in arms, and another portion long drilled in the Democratic ranks—who are determined to wrest from the hands of the ruling party in this country its political power by any means which they deem necessary, but at all hazards to wrest it. I say not too much, perhaps, when I say that the other party, so far as they can be called a party, are equally determined to uphold the rights and the liberty of the country. The means by which the party holding the majority in Congress are determined to retain this political power are means which are entirely consistent with the practices of the Government, and with peace and the highest order; and therefore I was quite surprised at the sensitiveness of the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] at his holy horror at the proposed distribution of arms. Sir, it is "the wicked that flee when no man pursueth," but it is another class that are as "bold as a lion." My friend seemed to be peculiarly sensitive on the subject of the distribution of arms in the State of Indiana, where he says the present Governor is a candidate for reelection. If my assurance would be worth anything to the honorable Senator I would administer a sedative and quiet his nerves by saying that it is not the danger of the arms that are to be distributed, but it is the danger of the other thing to him more powerful than arms. It is not fear of the bullet, but of the ballot that ails my distinguished friend, a more potent weapon in this warfare, and the one upon which we rely.

I took occasion yesterday to look at the statutes in relation to the distribution of arms, and I find that for sixty years there has been a standing appropriation of $200,000 a year on the statute laws of the country for the distribution of arms among the States. I take it for granted, therefore, that there is nothing new in the distribution of arms to the States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I would call the attention of my friend, also, to the Constitution, which expressly provides that Congress shall provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia.

Mr. NYE. That is a part of the Constitution that the Democratic party at this time do not read; it is a part that my honorable friend from Indiana has overlooked. That portion of the Constitution is now about to be answered by the distribution of these arms; and like the scared hare, like the frightened deer, like the crazed tiger, we see all the ears of the Democracy standing on end in view of the danger of distributing these arms; and the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. VICKERS,] who is so meek and kind in his demeanor, had no objection at all if they were not delivered until after the election. Acute as he is, far seeing as he is, he saw no danger in the elements if the arms were not distributed until after election. And so with my ardent friend from Indiana; he inquired with great emphasis why it was that these arms were to be distributed before the election.

Sir, the constitutional mandate has no regard to an election. It is made the duty of the General Government to provide for the organization and arming of the militia, and the Constitution is mute upon the question of time.

Mr. CONKLING. As the honorable Senator from Nevada is referring to the Constitution, I beg to remind him of the fact that the Constitution when amended by the First Congress received as its second amendment a provision that the right of the people to bear arms should never be questioned. The Senator from New Jersey has the language before him.

Mr. NYE. I am obliged to the honorable Senator; I was about to refer to that fact myself. It is a great constitutional privilege the people have to bear arms, and it is the duty of the Government to furnish them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will read the exact language:

"A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

Mr. NYE. That is the language of the Constitution. It shows the right of the citizen to bear arms and the duty of the Government to furnish them when organized regularly as militia of States.

Mr. President, there is something portentous in the fright of my honorable friend from Indiana. I was not so much alarmed at the surprise expressed by my honorable friend from Maryland, but my friend from Indiana is a bold fighter, and I entertain no doubt that he understands the tactics of the coming canvass, for he tells us that it is to be the most exciting that there ever was. I do not believe it. It will be the most exciting canvass that there ever was in this nation if the mad-caps of his party control it; but I hope the wiser heads like his own will control it and have it peaceful.

In view of these constitutional rights and privileges and duties, I look around me to see why this alarm; and I say to this Senate and the country that I entertain no doubt that when this Congress adjourns everything possible will be done that is within the executive power and which will not incur the apprehension of impeachment, to overthrow these organized governments of the South; and I believe that the moon will not once fill her horn after this adjournment, if an adjournment be had, before the President, with the military powers at his back, if he can command it, will drive every elected Governor from his seat unless he has the means of protecting himself. We have an example of how much these States covet and need arms in the case of the State of Maryland. When she went through a great political revolution a few years since she bought ten thousand stand of arms, and that was before election and after, for there were several elections during the time. This uneasiness bespeaks trouble. This idea of placing the power of defense in the hands of these organized State governments causes a Democratic flutter that amounts to alarm. I am glad to see them alarmed.

Every Senator on this floor will agree that the first great duty of the Government is to protect its citizens; and there is no means by which we can protect them save by the arming of the organized militia of the several States in existing harmony with the Union. It is useless to shut our eyes to existing facts. My honorable friend from Indiana says that he has read the stories of wrong and outrage at the South until they have ceased to be sensational.

Sir, it is too true our ears have become too much accustomed to the tale of these wrongs and outrages to which our friends have been subjected until it has become almost an everyday story, and the dripping blood or the dying groan has ceased to excite in many even a warm gushing of sympathy; and especially is that true of the Democratic party. They gloat over it; it is only so many Republicans gone, making a Democratic triumph more sure! But Mr. President, in the day of judgment we shall be held responsible for these outrages and wrongs. To hold men to the duty of citizens and not arm them for their own defense is like leading them up to the shambles for execution and laughing as the fatal blow is struck. Against all such things I enter my solemn protest as a citizen of this great country. It is a blot upon our fair fame that she has so long countenanced it.

But my friend from Indiana says that his principal objection to this bill is that it arms only loyal men. I wish my friend were here that I might ask him if he would like to arm disloyal men with the Government's arms. I had always thought that his sympathies were with loyal men. What other men should be armed but loyal men? Loyal citizens are the support of a loyal government. "Loyal men" has a most distinctive and important meaning at the present moment with the party in power here. I know that the Democratic party have ceased to divide with any care on that subject, for in their convention you saw assembled men whose hands are yet red and whose hearts are charged with rebellion; and they are the leaders. The shouts that went up as Wade Hampton spoke made a reporter who had been in the war drop his pen and exclaim "The rebel yell," with an oath which I will not repeat. So it was the rebel yell. Why not? Their great chieftain was there, as I said the other day, a man who made a vacant seat at every hearthstone in the northern States. Men as imprudent in political action as they were rash in their military leadership are out on the stump. Governor Vance, who was a prisoner of war here, has been making a speech at Richmond, in which he declared to the people there that the election of Seymour and Blair will give them what they fought for in the rebellion. Here is another great leader, second in command of the disloyal forces of the nation, Alexander H. Stephens, who sends his resolutions to the Democratic convention, and they are received with shouts and applause.

Mr. President, it is in view of these facts and because the Democratic party is led by rebels that I think it is unsafe for this Congress to adjourn. Believe me, sir, that if this Congress lets go of itself and surrenders up its power that it holds when in session, this country will again be rocked from center to circumference with revolution. They mean it. Even the Conservatives, velvet-footed as they are, step up to the music of the hour. Hence the apprehension of scattering arms among the militia, a thing as old as the Government itself. It attracted no attention and caused no alarm before the rebellion, until every southern arsenal was full and every northern one empty at the time the rebellion broke out. There was in it no danger then. They had the Democratic Jeff. Davis at the head of the War Department. California, it was supposed, might be swung into the rebellion, and on her distant shores there were more arms than the States of New York and Pennsylvania together had. Then there was no apprehension about distributing arms ad libitum. It was Democratic then. It did not arouse even the apprehensions of my friend from Wisconsin; but now since he has started on this new tack he has got afraid of powder, as he ought to be. In 1861 Davis took all the arms of the Government and went off. Where was the Democratic cry of an unequal or dangerous distribution then? Oh, no; they are alarmed only when you strike the chord of loyal men. Sir, I wish the nation to understand that so far as this Congress are concerned, they are the only class of men we intend to arm.

Imagine, Mr. President, a Democratic militia. Forrest would organize it in Tennessee, a man whose name is written in eternal infamy as the coldest, bloodiest butcher of the nineteenth century. There would be no danger of putting arms in his hands, I take it, before election or after either! He would murder as coolly at one time as another. I am surprised at this Democratic sensitiveness on this subject. It is a weapon that they know well to wield. They have wielded it with tremendous power. They have clothed this nation with the habiliments of mourning. They have made more new-made graves than all parties of this nation. It is the murderer that is afraid of the sword of justice. They apprehend that arms in loyal men's hands may be used for purposes as vile as they would use them themselves; but I can give them a little comfort on that question. Arms in the hands of loyal men will only be used in the direst necessity and in defense of their individual rights, and in defense of the public liberties of the country. That is the use which will be made of them. Fear not, my Democratic friends; you have no Forrest at the head, no Wade Hampton, no Davis; but men who are scarred all over with wounds received honorably in the strife to perpetuate this country. They will use them as becomes dignified citizens and a liberty-loving people, individually and en masse, no matter of what color. Ay, sir, even the half barbarians that the gentlemen tell us of would not be so cruel as their intelligent whites. Sir, the charm of the measure is in the word "loyalty," and that is what excites apprehension. Hereafter, Mr. President, during all the history of this country, that word will have a peculiar and potent significance. The word and its meaning will be taught to the children of this Republic to the remotest day; and history will impress it upon us as a most important and distinctive word when we speak of citizens of this country.

Mr. President, while my friend from Indiana disclaims speaking for the President of the United States, I have noticed one thing, that almost always the President has done just about what the Senator from Indiana suggested as the rule of action. One thing this country will rely upon: he will do that which will harm the controlling power of this Government the most he can. He will overthrow these governments which have now assumed a quasi peaceful appearance, and he will plunge them again, if possible, into the direst anarchy that ever was seen. We owe certainly to those men who have come up and established these loyal governments through much tribulation, black and white, that protection which is due to the American citizen; and I say that it would be bad faith on the part of Congress to adjourn and leave that bill quivering in the balance of uncertainty. I regard it as far more important than some of the appropriation bills. The country would live without them; but without this the buds of liberty that are now springing forth in the southern States will never blossom.

I hope, therefore, that the longest day possible will be named, and I hope that when that day is reached we shall not adjourn. The country and the world look to the present Congress of this nation to save the country. Struggling loyalty in the southern States looks to Congress; and an anxious North, and East and West, look to Congress to sustain the principles of this Government; and above all, when the broad issue is made between the Executive and Congress, we shall be cowards to shrink from the issue which we have made. I hope, sir, that Congress will not do that. I hope Monday will be fixed; and when Monday comes, if we can get away let us go, but do not let us get away so that we cannot come back unless upon the call of the President. He would call us but under one set of circumstances, if by the call he could annihilate us.

Mr. President, I have said all that I desired to say. I hope the Senate will act prudently on this question. I hope they will take a recess, and then on the day named for reassembling enough can come here to make a quorum, if it is necessary; but at any rate let us not adjourn finally.

Mr. CONKLING. Before the honorable Senator takes his seat I desire to ask him a question merely for information, as he has no doubt thought somewhat on the subject. No doubt the suggestion has occurred to him which occurs to me, and I beg to put to him this inquiry: suppose the President, for his allusion is to him, shall do some of these things which he deprecates: suppose a requisition is made by the Governor of one of these newly habilitated States for troops, and the President says, "Looking upon this as I do, I do not think troops are necessary, and therefore I shall send none;" in that emergency, or in any such emergency, I inquire of the Senator what we should do if we were here, to mitigate the evil or to avoid the difficulty?

Mr. NYE. I will answer the honorable Senator. I would pass a law as quick as the rules of legislation would admit, that the Governors of the several States should call out the militia upon their own responsibility and put down rebellion in their States. That is what I would do.

Mr. CONKLING. Does not the Senator know that by the constitutions which we have approved, and by the common law lying back of all constitutions, every one of those Governors has that power now in the fullest sense?

Mr. NYE. Very well; if that would not do I would have Congress introduce a resolution for the impeachment of the President, and impeach him in ten hours, if he refused to do that duty.

Mr. SUMNER. That ought to be done now.

Mr. CONKLING. I have respect for that answer of the Senator from Nevada. I think it is the answer of a lawyer and a logician. It is fair for the Senator to say that he would be here, and if this Executive, breaking through the rules of his duty, shows that he is fatally bent on mischief he would impeach and depose him. There I agree with the Senator, as I could not do if, taking the idea which I infer prevails with some other members of this body, he should suggest that it was the duty of the two Houses of Congress to crouch here like two watch-dogs, barking to prevent executive encroachment.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not like the figure of my honorable friend. I insist upon it that Congress is not crouching when it stands to its post of duty. I insist upon it that if it is necessary I would turn watch-dog to save this country; and if my honorable friend feels that he is demeaning himself when he stands here at a time when the air is full of danger, with an Executive bent upon the destruction of the liberties of his country—if he feels that he is crouching when he stands here to watch by those liberties, I do not believe he means to be so understood.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator and I do not seem to understand the word "crouch" alike.

Mr. NYE. No, sir; I would stand here in manly erectness; I would stand here in senatorial erectness—not a dog, not crouching. I would give the world to understand and the liberty loving people of this world to know that here between the evil designs of a wicked President and the liberties of this country Congress stands like a wall of fire, and here it will stand. But, sir, I submitted these views on a former occasion, and I was beaten then, as I probably shall be now; but I do not intend that the responsibility for the consequences shall be upon me.

Mr. WILLEY. I rise, sir, not for the purpose of prolonging this discussion, but by way of personal explanation. A few evenings ago I took occasion to reply to the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] who had stated that the purpose of the bill then before the Senate was simply to have an influence on the ensuing election. To show him that there were other necessities, true necessities, in the southern States, growing out of the disorganized state of society there and the insecurity of life and property, and in attempting to make my point in response to him I took occasion to read some extracts from a report which had been recently made before the constitutional convention now sitting in the State of Texas. Yesterday the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] took occasion to animadvert upon what I said and upon the extracts which I read in terms very severe and I think in terms somewhat uncourteous. The Senator undertook to tell me and the Senate that he was tired of such recitals; that such recitals were disgusting to him, and finally concluded by saying that they were unworthy of credit, and that he believed nothing in them at all. Now, Mr. President, humble as I am upon this floor, when I feel upon my responsibility as a member of the Senate that it is my duty to give information which is in my possession, which I believe is material to the proper action of the Senate, I desire the Senator from Indiana to understand that he will have to listen to the recital and he will have to prepare himself for additional disgust. I must be allowed to be controlled by my own sense of propriety and duty.

But, sir, my main purpose in rising was to place the character of the document from which I read more distinctly before the Senate and the country. I read from an official document published by the constitutional convention now sitting in the State of Texas. That document was a report made by seven of the leading members of that convention, namely: Messrs. Caldwell, Whitmore, Sumner, Evans, Bledsoe, Cole, and Bell. With the chairman of that committee I have a personal acquaintance. Of several of the other members of that committee I have a historical knowledge. Some of them I have understood fought through the late war and made an honorable record for themselves. As I stated the other day, the chairman of that committee is a gentleman personally known to me, Judge Caldwell, long a resident of Texas, a man of southern birth, born in Tennessee, personally known to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. FOWLER] as a man of honor, a man of integrity, a man of intelligence; and I will take occasion here to say, since I have brought his name under the criticism of the honorable Senator from Indiana, that he is a man who in intelligence, in integrity, in honor, and in patriotism will receive no detriment by any comparison or by any test with the honorable Senator from Indiana himself. And, sir, I am advised that several others of that committee, who made this report over their own signatures, and which has been authorized to be published to the world, are men of equal intelligence, of equal honor, and of equal veracity. It was their report that I read to the Senate; and since the honorable Senator from Indiana has taken occasion to express himself in the manner to which I have alluded in respect to their report I will, take occasion to read from that report what they think of men who deny their allegations, and I want to place it distinctly upon the record to-day. So far as the allusion of that Senator has reference to myself, so far as his disgust was intended to be applied to me, I can as well pass any such expression from him without notice as he can afford to make it. These gentlemen say in their report, and I read it in response to what that honorable Senator said:

"Now, incomplete as they are, these figures tell a frightful story of blood. They represent stubborn facts, which cannot be suppressed by denials or by denouncing them as fabricated for political effect. And whoever attempts it is not only unfaithful to history, not only an apologist for crime, but may be justly charged as an accessory to the wickedness itself, as encouraging and abetting murderers, and as equally guilty with them. We cannot shut our eyes upon these appalling scenes of bloodshed; and instead of attempting to conceal them, it becomes us to face them honestly, and address ourselves to the duty of discovering the cause and locating the responsibility of this slaughter of our fellow-citizens."

Mr. President, I should have hesitated to introduce the names of these gentlemen before the Senate if I had supposed they would be subjected to such passionate criticism and animadversion; but since I did it I leave their names and their statement here upon record, and they will go out to the country side by side with the name and the criticism of the Senator from Indiana; and high as that is, I venture to say that the country and history will make no comparison to the detriment of these seven honorable men of Texas.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am indifferent whether we fix Friday or Monday as the day of adjournment. If gentlemen think we cannot well get through with business until Monday, be it so. I know nothing to prevent our getting through now except the executive business. There is considerable of that, and it may occasion some debate. There are reasons why, I think, we ought to fix one of these days as the day of adjournment, in addition to those that have been stated. One is that I am satisfied the longer we stay the more damage we do. I address myself to my friends on this side of the house. I think the recent legislation and debates, if not in this body, elsewhere, are calculated to injure us exceedingly, and the sooner we get out of this place and attend to matters at home the better. That is my judgment. Another reason is this: gentlemen have evidently been thinking of what they are going to say before the people in the coming canvass, and if we do not adjourn soon we shall have all the speeches here. We have had samples already, political speeches, evidently thought of or floating through the minds of gentlemen as fine arguments to be made when they get before the people. I think they had better be left till they get there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, to strike out "Friday, the 24th," and insert "Monday, the 27th," upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Fessenden, Fowler, Harlan, McDonald, Morton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Van Winkle, Welch, Willey, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cole, Conkling, Davis, Doolittle, Frelighuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Sherman, Trumbull, Vickers, Whyte, and Williams—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Kelogg, Norton, Nye, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Wade, and Yates—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] to strike out all after the word "that" and insert a substitute.

Mr. SUMNER. I am in favor of the amendment. The only question is a practical one as to whether the time proposed for meeting is the best. It is proposed, I think, that Congress shall come together on the fourth Monday of September. I have thought that a better day would be the second Wednesday of September. I throw that out by way of suggestion rather than to make a motion.

Mr. WILSON. I have modified my amendment, and I ask that it be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the word "that" and insert:

The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 27th day of July, at twelve o'clock meridian, adjourn their respective Houses until the third Monday of September; and on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday in December, 1868.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONKLING. I suppose the Senator by moving this amendment intends it as a proposition providing for a conditional session if a quorum shall appear, and otherwise carrying Congress over until the settled day.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir; the same as the meeting in July last year.

Mr. CONKLING. Just the same as our meeting in July last year, the Senator obliges me by saying. There was a time when I should have felt entirely free to vote for such a resolution as this. I offered it several years ago in the House of Representatives as a mode of providing for an adjournment. This proposition in substance, as the Senator says, was adopted in March of last year at the end of the extra session of Congress; and when we came here in July we were met by an elaborate protest made by the colleague of the Senator, who now offers the proposition, which went so far as to declare that we had acted in derogation and violation of the Constitution of the United States in passing such a resolution. I beg to read a word or two of what the Senator [Mr. SUMNER] submitted on that occasion. The resolution having been read, the Senator said:

"I rise to a question of order on that resolution, which I submit as follows: that the resolution under which Congress is to-day assembled, so far as it undertakes to direct the adjournment of the two Houses of Congress without day, is unconstitutional and inoperative, inasmuch as the Constitution, after declaring that 'a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business,' proceeds to provide that 'a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members;' and, therefore, such resolution must not be regarded by the Chair so far as it undertakes to provide for an adjournment without day. As, according to the view, there is a quorum already present, the incident contemplated by the resolution will not probably arise; but I felt it my duty, by way of precaution and caveat, to introduce now this protest, to the end that that resolution may not hereafter be drawn into a precedent so as to abridge the rights of the two Houses of Congress under the Constitution of the United States."

The debate proceeded, and this was stated more at length; but it will be seen now that under the guise of a provision for a conditional and possible session of Congress we are about to vote upon a proposition which, according to the judgment of the colleague of the mover of it, has no legal effect except to adjourn us from the day fixed until that day in September which has been named, and that the whole provision beyond that is nugatory and a violation of the Constitution. I think that it need not be drawn into a precedent, as the Senator said on that occasion. We had better vote upon the old-fashioned proposition that we understand and not be drawn into one so ambiguous as this has been rendered by the judgment pronounced upon it by the honorable Senator.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the sufficient answer to the Senator from New York is that the session of last July was held under and by virtue of a resolution identical in its terms with that on which the Senate is now about to vote. If, when Congress comes together in September, the question should arise contemplated by the point of order presented by myself last July, then will be the time to consider and decide it. If there be a quorum present, there will be no occasion. If the occasion requires a quorum it will be here in order to transact the business of this Republic. And now the practical question is whether, because of some possible question of order hereafter, we shall fail to make proper provision for a session in the coming month of September. Sir, I shall not be frightened from doing my duty in that regard by any possible question of order that may arise at that time. Should the question arise which I felt it my duty to state last July, and to which the Senator from New York has called attention, I shall be ready then to act upon it. There was no occasion at that time to act upon it, nor is there any great reason to suppose that there will be any occasion to act upon it now. If public business demands a meeting of Congress and we do not leave ourselves entirely powerless there will be a quorum here in both Houses ready for the transaction of business. At least in that confidence I am willing to make provision for the future.

Mr. CONKLING. But I insist upon having this point understood before we vote. The Senator himself last year offered the resolution. I happen to remember that because he came to me and borrowed it of me. The Globe will show that, although I have not looked to find it. He offered the resolution; he gave it the sanction of that fact; and when we came back here in July he insisted that it was a resolution providing for an absolute session on the 3d of July, and that if there were no quorum here it would be the duty of the Sergeants-at-Arms to bring in members enough to make a quorum of both Houses. I differed with him about that; but I do not wish to be caught in such a trap a second time.

Mr. SHERMAN. And under those circumstances, less than a quorum, it was argued, could only adjourn from day to day.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; the claim was, as my friend from Ohio reminds me—that occurs in the debate which is here of record—that all we could do would be to adjourn from day to day until a quorum was brought here. I do not wish to have this added to all the other sensations, to all the other rant and fashion which are to be made use of in the country to induce an extra session of Congress. I remember very well how the session was brought about on the 3d of last July. I remember hearing a great many persons talk about it who, in my belief, did not understand more than we did here, to say the least, what the exigency was; and yet the effect was to get up a feeling in deference to which every Senator and every member who could reach the capital felt bound to come. I say I do not wish added to that as a make-weight an argument that a resolution has been adopted under which we must come in order to avoid having the Sergeants-at-Arms of the two Houses sent to assemble a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. NYE. I desire to say that on the questions connected with the matter of adjournment I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Thayer, Tipton, Welch, and Wilson—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Doellittle, Fessenden, Fowler, Henderson, Hendricks, McGreevy, Morton, Patterson of Tennessee, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Wavie, Wiley, and Williams—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Flinningsen, Grimes, Howard, Norton, Nye, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Wade, and Yates—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

THE FUNDING BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate meet this evening at half past seven o'clock for the transaction of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust my friend from Rhode Island will allow me to have the funding bill disposed of. It will take but a moment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States has been returned by the House of Representatives with amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendments need not be read. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to; and the amendments were non-concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn was read twice by its title.

Mr. STEWART. There is no necessity for referring that bill. One of the persons is a member-elect of the other House who desires to be relieved so that he can take his seat. I ask unanimous consent to put the bill on its passage.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot now be considered.

Mr. STEWART. Let it be referred.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PROPOSED EVENING SESSION.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet this evening at half past seven o'clock; and I should like to have it understood that the Senate at that time will take up for consideration the bill, which has been pressed upon their attention so long, for the protection of citizens abroad. I should like to get this evening's session to dispose of that bill; and I think the Senate will concede that. I make that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I humbly submit that the motion is not in order. I made a motion and gave way, if I could give way without losing the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not so understand it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The President will declare.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator to withdraw his motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair may have been mistaken.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I hope the motion of my friend from California will not prevail, but that we shall first dispose of the executive business. I am perfectly willing to take a vote now on the bill in which my friend from California has so much interest; but I am not willing to have speeches made here that had better be made on the stump, delaying us in the business that we must transact. Although I am perfectly ready to vote on that question, I cannot agree with my friend from California in the importance he ascribes to it. I think the bill as it came from the Committee on Foreign Relations, if I may say so without offense, is a stupidity, and, I think, as proposed to be amended by the Senator from California, it is an atrocity. The one is to require the Government to do what the Government always has done and always will do, and what every Government that has any sort of self respect must do, to protect its own citizens, and the other is that the Government shall adopt the policy of King Theodorus.

Mr. CONNESS. It is a great pity, Mr. President, that we are not all gifted with the same sense of propriety, the same discretion, the same regard for the economy of public time as my honorable friend from Rhode Island.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have often thought so. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator replies he has often thought so. It is very evident he has estimated his share of those great virtues very largely, and that he estimates the share possessed by others in an opposite degree.

Now, Mr. President, there is a great deal said from time to time about making speeches. I suppose that every Senator who is here has a privilege, and it does not lay with the Senator from Rhode Island to protest against the exercise of that privilege. The Senator makes the remark that he does in reference to my motion to get a session for the consideration of the bill named, notwithstanding that I have begged again and again of the Senate to vote without further discussion of that measure. Nay, sir, I believe that the Senators who desired to submit some remarks had announced that they would not do so and were ready to vote; and yet the Senator gives us this gratuitous speech. I do not know whom he means to reflect upon; but I think it were as well not made in this connection.

His summing up of the value of this bill I have not so much respect for. I usually entertain the deepest consideration and respect for all that my friend thinks and says and does; but his denunciation of this measure, in my opinion, is hardly worthy of him.

I ask the Senate to give an evening session for this business. If the Senate are ready to vote now upon the question I am entirely ready to vote. I have no further remarks to submit. I did not at any time intend to submit remarks occupying five minutes of time; but the Senator charged with the conduct of foreign affairs upon this floor felt it his duty to make an extended speech, and I could not sit and listen silently to that speech without replying to it; and I do not feel that I owe an apology to my friend for having done so. It may be, and I regret that what I said in this connection was so unpalatable to my friend; but I cannot help that. It must remain, and I must remain under the ban.

Mr. ANTHONY. I made no remark on the Senator's speech certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope now we shall get the vote on this motion and have this session.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island, that as there is a great storm going on of thunder and lightning and rain we might just as well take the vote on this question now.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I will move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I think we can dispose of it in a few minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no sort of objection if we can get a vote; but if not, I give notice that the first time I shall be so fortunate as to get the floor I shall move to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. All right; upon that I shall call for the yeas and nays, and let the Senate decide.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill before the Senate as the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Several SENATORS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. SUMNER. We are to vote on the amendments of the committee first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendments of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to have the amendments stated by the Chair, and read by the Clerk as they stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment reported by the committee will be read to the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the first amendment, which was after the word "retained," in the ninth line of section three, to strike out the following words:

The President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to suspend in part, or wholly, commercial relations with the said Government, or in case no other remedy is available, to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, except ambassadors and other public ministers and their domestics and domestic servants; and the President shall, without delay, give information to Congress of any proceedings under this act.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

It shall be the duty of the President forthwith to report to Congress all the circumstances of any such arrest and detention, and any proceedings for the release of the citizen so arrested and detained, that Congress may take prompt action to secure to every citizen of the United States his just rights.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us vote on that.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe I submitted an amendment to that amendment of the committee, which is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California proposes an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. It is now pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be first considered.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, which was to strike out in the third section, in the part proposed to be stricken out by the committee, in lines ten, eleven, and twelve, the following words:

To suspend in part, or wholly, commercial relations with the said Government in case no other remedy is available.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no objection to that amendment. That is entirely in harmony with the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. If there be no objection to it, of course it will be adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be adopted. [A pause.] Now let the question come on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. We do not concede the right of the Senator from Massachusetts to accept any amendment. I suppose it is the business and duty of the Senate to vote upon every proposition of amendment, and I want the privilege of voting myself upon every proposition that is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. VICKERS. Mr. President, I have but a few remarks to make explanatory of the vote I am about to give on the bill now under consideration by the Senate. I understand that four treaties with foreign nations have been negotiated which secure to all persons naturalized in our country, when abroad, all the rights which belong to native American citizens, and that treaties with other nations are in process of negotiation which will doubtless produce similar results. The telegraphic information recently received from Great Britain is that she has declared her purpose to adopt the views of our Government on the subject of the rights of American naturalized citizens.

When our distinguished minister plenipotentiary shall have been presented at the Court of St. James, one of his earliest duties will be the negotiation of a treaty on this subject, which, like those alluded to, will secure to our naturalized citizens all that our Government may desire. Similar treaties with the other Governments in the world will no doubt be made and ratified by the American Senate, and thus, without threats, reprisals, or war, all that we can reasonably expect will be accomplished by diplomacy, which will better comport with the civilization of the age and the genius and spirit of our institutions.

Let us not, by passing the third section of this bill as it came from the House, embarrass our minister, who is about to enter upon the delicate and responsible duties of his embassy under auspices the most favorable, and which promise results that will be alike honorable and beneficial to two of the greatest Powers of the world.

I honor Great Britain for her just and noble conduct to recover a number of her subjects held as captives in Abyssinia after she had exhausted her long and peaceful efforts at negotiation to reclaim them; and I would honor more the acts of our own Government to defend the rights of the humblest oppressed American citizen after negotiations shall have failed to secure them, and especially when unjustly seized and imprisoned by a foreign country; but Congress, to whom the Constitution has intrusted the right to make war, will not, when an emergency shall arise, be found derelict to its high duty, but will be ready to maintain, with the power of the nation, the dignity and honor of the country, and the just rights of every American citizen, native and naturalized.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I am in favor of the general idea embodied in this bill, and I intend to vote for it if it can assume such a form as to commend itself to my judgment. But this section, in my opinion, is open to very strong objections. I doubt very much whether we can confide to the President of the United States by a general law of this kind the power of precipitating hostilities with foreign Governments. This section provides that the President, upon his own judgment, in a certain state of facts, may arrest citizens of foreign countries and hold them in custody as enemies. Although this act upon his part may not be accompanied by any public declaration or proclamation of the intention of our Government, it is in its very nature an act of hostility; and it seems to me that inasmuch as the power to declare war is lodged exclusively with Congress by the Constitution it is very doubtful whether such authority as this should be confided to the President.

Mr. STEWART. Would it not be an act of hostility on the part of any other Government to arrest American citizens? Are they not the aggressors in an act of hostility? And can we not retaliate?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Very true, sir; but foreign Governments are not bound by the Constitution of the United States; and therefore the Senator's point has no application to the argument.

Mr. STEWART. My point in this: that being an act of hostility, Congress says in advance that the United States will resist acts of hostility from any Government in defense of our citizens.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Well, sir, the power to declare war against a particular nation is a very different thing from a power to confide in the President of the United States the authority to declare war or to commit an act of hostility, as he may think proper, in a given state of facts. It is his act, it is his discretion, it is his authority that is exercised in such a case, and not that of Congress as provided for in the Constitution.

Again, in this section it is provided:

That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested, and is detained by any foreign Government, in contravention of the intent and purposes of this act—

Then he may take the particular steps provided. By the second section, to which reference is made, it is provided that all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign countries shall enjoy all the privileges of native-born citizens of the United States, and shall have the same protection extended to them. We have just negotiated treaties with Prussia and with other Powers, by which it is provided that a citizen of a foreign country who emigrates to the United States shall reside here full five years before he shall be entitled in his own country, if he shall return to it, to the privileges of a citizen of the United States. By our laws we have provided that a foreigner who has performed military service for one year in the armies of the United States shall be entitled to naturalization, and we have naturalized many such persons, and under our law a great number may be naturalized hereafter.

By this bill a foreigner who has performed military service for one year in the armies of the United States and has received letters of naturalization is to be protected by the President of the United States when he goes abroad into his own former country, and the President is compelled, if he shall be called to account in that foreign country and arrested, to seize citizens of that foreign country who may be within the limits of the United States, and hold them in custody. The exercise of such a power will be in plain violation of the treaties which we have made with Prussia and with other Powers, and those treaties may be followed (because it seems now to be a system) by treaties with most, if not all, the other leading Governments in the world. In what predicament then does it place the President of the United States? He will be commanded by this law to exercise a power and an authority which will be in plain contempt and in plain violation of existing treaties which have been negotiated by him and confirmed by the Senate, in violation of the public faith?

If there were no other objections than these two which I have stated, it seems to me that this third section ought to be voted down; that we cannot adopt it without violating our public duty and without imposing upon the President of the United States the performance of a duty which cannot be confided to him under the Constitution by Congress.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to ask the Senator before he leaves the subject, to whom would he in any event confide the duty of resisting aggressions of any kind? If the arrest of one of our citizens by a foreign Government is an act of aggression is Congress to see that wrong redressed? Is Congress to do it itself, or must it do it by the Executive?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Congress by an act may empower the President to take the necessary steps.

Mr. STEWART. That is just exactly what this bill proposes.

Mr. BUCKALEW. No, sir; this bill does not propose that in any specific case. This bill proposes to confer the power of Congress upon the President. Instead of exercising its own judgment and discretion in a case of this kind, it is to confer that power on the President. That is the very point.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose Great Britain should refuse to receive our mails, would it not be competent to pass a law saying the President should refuse to receive theirs? Suppose Great Britain should break off commercial relations, would it not be competent for Congress to say, "If Great Britain breaks off commercial relations, the President will do so on our part;" and so through the whole line of such aggressions.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Of course, in such a case the President would submit to Congress to decide whether we would go to war or not, or what other remedy we should adopt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. The question, Mr. President, is on the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from California to move an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I said there was no objection to that.

Mr. CONNESS. Then let it be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts may not have any objection to it, but other Senators may have. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to ask if the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee will render the proposed amendment that I have submitted out of order, can I then move to substitute my amendment for the section as amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it will not preclude the Senator's amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to inquire whether the amendment to the amendment is merely to strike out a part of the matter which is proposed to be stricken out by the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. That is all.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, let the question be taken on the committee's amendment. The amendment of the committee is to strike out these words:

The President shall be, and hereby is, empowered to suspend in part, or wholly, commercial relations with the said Government, or in case no other remedy is available, to order the arrest and to detain in custody any subject or citizen of such foreign Government who may be found within the jurisdiction of the United States, and who has not declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, except ambassadors and other public ministers and their domestics and domestic servants, and the President shall, without delay, give information to Congress of any proceedings under this act.

And to substitute instead these words:

It shall be the duty of the President forthwith to report to Congress all the circumstances of any such arrest and detention and any proceedings for the release of the citizen so arrested and detained, that Congress may take prompt action to secure to every citizen of the United States his just rights.

Mr. STEWART. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I desire to occupy just a minute. My objection to this amendment of the committee is in brief that it does not direct the President of the United States to do any thing whatever, no matter what the case may be, except to report to Congress. If Congress be not in session he necessarily waits until Congress shall be in session; and during that time any number of such offenses may have occurred, while it is not made his duty to do anything whatever in the premises.

Mr. SUMNER. My objection to the text of the bill which it is proposed to strike out is that it is a proposal of unutterable barbarism, which if adopted would disgrace this country.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to amend the amendment by inserting in the twentieth line, after the word "Congress," the words "whenever in session."

Mr. SUMNER. Let the question be taken on this amendment as it stands first.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Davis, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomroy, Rice, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Nye, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, and Whyte—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cameron, Dixon, Doolittle, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, McGreevy, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Wade, Welch, and Yates—27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now move—

Mr. SUMNER. There is one other amendment of the committee to be acted upon.

Mr. CONNESS. What is it?

Mr. SUMNER. In the preamble.

Mr. CONNESS. That is not in order now.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon. The first question is on the amendments of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CONKLING. The preamble is voted on last.

Mr. SUMNER. I know that; but you first go through the amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the preamble is not yet in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the third section as it has been amended, and to substitute for it the following:

That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment; and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen; and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall as soon as practicable be communicated by the President to Congress.

I simply wish to say one word upon this amendment. Every one can see that the section as it has been amended by the committee amounts to nothing. It simply requires the President, in case he ascertains a certain fact, to communicate that fact to Congress. So far as that goes toward protecting the rights of American citizens abroad it amounts to nothing; for after this communication is made to Congress, if Congress legislates on the subject, Congress must necessarily empower the Executive to do something. Congress is not invested with any direct powers to examine into the cases of American citizens imprisoned abroad and afford the necessary relief. Congress, it is true, might declare war against the foreign Government; but that is not necessary in ordinary cases.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to suggest to him the propriety of striking out the word "unjustly" where it first occurs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I drew the amendment in that way in the first place, but some Senators suggested that I had better insert the word "unjustly."

Mr. HOWE. No; because that requires the President to ascertain that it is unjust before he can inquire what it is about.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe it would be as well as originally drawn.

I have simply expressed my view of the section as it stands amended by the committee. It seems to me we ought not to legislate upon this subject at all, or else we ought to do something that is of practical value. Evidently there is a great feeling in the country on this question, for both of the political parties have been very particular to put in their respective platforms resolutions in reference to this identical matter; of course demanding some legislation at the hands of Congress. The amendment which I propose is entirely simple, and requires the President to take some action.

The original bill did not require the President to do anything at all. It empowered him to do certain things in case he saw proper to act; but whether he would act or not was entirely left in his discretion; and then, when he does act under the bill as amended, all that he is required to do is simply to make a report to Congress.

This amendment proposes that the President shall investigate the case of a citizen of the United States unjustly imprisoned in a foreign country; that if it appears to him that the imprisonment is wrongful or in violation of the rights of American citizenship, he shall demand his release, and if this release is unreasonably refused, then he is authorized to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as in his judgment may be necessary either to obtain or effectuate the release of this imprisoned citizen. That seems to me to be a plain, straightforward provision. It requires action on the part of the Executive. It does not require any violent or vindictive action. It does not necessarily put in the hands of the President any power to involve the nation in war; but it simply requires the Executive, the proper department of the Government, to regard the rights of all citizens, naturalized and native born, who may be imprisoned or deprived of their liberty in foreign countries.

This discussion has been conducted altogether with reference to Great Britain, as though that was the only country upon the face of the earth; but this law is to apply to all countries everywhere. No matter where an American citizen is seized and thrust into prison, this amendment provides that the Executive of this country shall see that he is restored to his rights. The defect in our system has been inattention on the part of the American Government to the rights of its citizens in foreign countries; and this amendment that I propose devolves a duty upon the President. He cannot remain idle when complaints are made to him, but he is to act, and, if possible, act so efficiently as to restore the citizen to his liberty.

I do not wish to trespass upon the patience of the Senate, but simply to explain the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. The amendment of the Senator and the remarks that he has made, it seems to me, go on a mistaken hypothesis. They accept the idea that there has been some failure on the part of our Government with reference to citizens abroad.

Mr. WILSON. Is not that true?

Mr. SUMNER. I think it is not true, and if time would allow now I could go into the evidence and show that it is not true. I have the documents here. But we are now entering upon this question to-night with an understanding, almost a compact, that there shall be no debate. I do not wish to break that compact. But here are documents lying on my table giving all the facts of record with regard to every American citizen who has been taken into custody abroad. Examine that record, and you will see how strenuous and steadfast our Government has been.

Permit me to say that the argument of the Senator from Oregon proceeds on a misunderstanding of the facts. There is no occasion now for any such legislative prompting to the Government of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is it, if everything has been so smooth and so placid upon this subject, that both of the political parties of this country have seen proper to put in their platforms resolutions in reference to the rights of American citizens abroad? What do they mean? The Senator may understand that they have always, everywhere, been religiously protected; but the American people do not understand it in that way.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not said that things were placid or smooth; but I have said that our Government had been strenuous and steadfast in the maintenance of the rights of American citizens, whether native born or naturalized; and the record will show the truth of what I say. Where has there been a failure? Has it been in Germany? Read the correspondence, running now over several years, between the United States and the different Powers of Germany, and see the fidelity with which the rights of our naturalized citizens have been maintained there.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to ask the Senator whether that fidelity that he describes in regard to the action of the Government concerning citizens arrested and imprisoned in Germany led to their release until the recent treaty was ratified?

Mr. SUMNER. I will answer the Senator. If the Senator would take the trouble to read the documents—

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the honorable Senator will answer without commenting upon my reading.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will allow me to answer in my own way. I wish to be as brief as possible. If the Senator will take the trouble to read the documents on the table he will see that among all the numerous applications made by the United States to the Government of Prussia, the leading Power of Germany, there is hardly an instance where this Power did not meet us kindly and generously. I speak according to the record. I have been over every one of these cases; and I must say, as I read them I felt a new gratification in the power of my country, which made itself felt for the protection of its citizens in those distant places. A letter went forth from one of our ministers, and though at that time this difficult question of expatriation was still unsettled, out of regard to our country, or out of regard it might be, sometimes, to the personal character of our minister, the claim was at once abandoned. You can hardly find an instance—

Mr. CONNESS rose.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator let me finish my sentence?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. You can hardly find an instance in that voluminous correspondence where the claim has been persisted in on the part of the Prussian Government.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SUMNER. I have the floor now, and do not mean to keep it long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. SUMNER. But what I was speaking of was the conduct of our own Government. That was the proposition with which I began.

I said that it needed no quickening such as the Senator from Oregon proposes to apply. There is no evidence that our Government has not been persistent and earnest for the protection of its citizens abroad, whether native born or naturalized, and I alluded to Prussia only by way of illustration. Pass that by. We have then the greater case and more complex of England. But I would rather not enter upon that. Here are the documents on my table, the passages all marked, which would illustrate the conduct of the British Government and the British tribunals toward every one of these persons whose names have been brought in question. I do not wish to go into that, although all the materials are at hand. I am speaking now of the conduct of our own Government rather than of the conduct of any other Government. Mark, sir, my reply to the Senator from Oregon was that our Government did not need any additional power or any additional impulse to activity in this behalf. Our Government has already the power to do everything that can be sanctioned by the law of nations, and it ought not to do anything else.

This brings me to the precise proposition of the Senator from Oregon. He proposes to empower the President in the event of any American citizen being unlawfully detained "to use such means not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper." The old law writers say that in these general terms there lurketh much trouble. Why use these general terms that of themselves require definition? What is the meaning of this language, "To use such means not amounting to acts of war?" The President cannot use acts of war, but he may use any means not amounting to acts of war. Pray, sir, where is the dividing line? Already in this debate the Senator from California has told us that reprisals were not acts of war, but acts of peace, and he proposes to invest the President with this hateful power. Does it not follow, then, from the very argument to which we have listened on this floor that under the proposition of the Senator from Oregon the President may have this barbarous power of reprisals which the Senate has now distinctly refused to confer, and that under these general terms, "not amounting to acts of war," he may undertake to hurl that disgraceful bolt? I entreat my friend from Oregon not to attempt to carry our country into any such dangerous position—dangerous for its character, for its honor, for its good name.

There is a proposition that I shall be willing to accept, for I see no danger in it, and I also see efficiency under the law of nations, and I believe that whatever we do in harmony with the law of nations will be done strongly, powerfully, effectively; but the moment you depart from the guidance of the law of nations while you think yourself powerful you make yourself weak.

I would propose to strike out these perilous words: "to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release, and all the facts," &c., and to insert simply, "That it shall be the duty of the President to suspend diplomatic relations with such foreign Power."

Mr. ANTHONY. Shall it be his duty absolutely?

Mr. SUMNER. The clause as it stands is: The President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen, and if the release so demanded be unreasonably delayed or refused it shall be the duty of the President, &c.

Then I propose to say:

To suspend diplomatic relations with such foreign Power.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He has that power now.

Mr. SUMNER. Unquestionably he has that power now. I will prepare the amendment that I suggest.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I shall be done in one moment if the Senator please.

Mr. CONNESS. The amendment will not be in order when written. I hope the Senator will finish his remarks, and allow other Senators to take the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. I move to strike out all after the word "President," and to insert "to suspend diplomatic relations with such foreign Power, and as soon as practicable to communicate the facts to Congress."

I will say, Mr. President, that, with the adoption of that amendment, the proposition of the Senator from Oregon would be less objectionable than it is now. I think it entirely unnecessary. The occasion does not require it. The bill does not need it. Nor would I urge my own amendment, except as a substitute. It is an improvement on the proposition of the Senator.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I rise simply for the purpose of trying to answer the question put by the honorable Senator from Oregon, which the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations did not answer, and that was why it happened, if our Government had done its duty in this regard, that there is so much of an agreement that something should be done about it among both political parties. I will state my idea of it. There has been a very considerable excitement among the Irish portion of our population on account of the Fenian troubles. A great many went over there with a design undoubtedly to stir up trouble in Ireland, and the consequence was that many of them were arrested; and probably some were arrested who had done no harm and who ought not to have been arrested. But the whole thing created an excitement in this country, especially among that part of our population, and they called for redress of what they supposed to be the grievances of that portion of the American people coming from that country who had been naturalized.

Again, the Germans were under a very considerable excitement on account of the claim of military service in different parts of Germany. They thought that having become citizens of this country when they went back there they were free from all claim of the country which they had left for military or other services; but the country to which they returned did not think so, and some were impressed into the military service. Consequently, an excitement was raised among that portion of our population which came from Germany.

While this excitement was going on, the position of both political parties was substantially this: the Republican party was very much afraid it would lose the German votes if it did not do something, and the Democratic party thought they would gain those votes if they did something; the Democratic party thought they would lose the Irish votes if they did not do something, and the Republican party hoped to get them if they did something. I take it that is the correct answer to the question.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, but for one simple fact, and facts are very stubborn things, the exposition of the Senator from Maine might stand very well; and that is, that the treaty with Prussia had been made and ratified—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not until after the excitement.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir; before the convention acted. The Senator replies, not until after the excitement was over. I do not know how he fixes dates, or when the excitement is over, or when it is not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was before the excitement arose, I said.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the excitement arose. Now, Mr. President, it is very well to denominate this opinion as excitement. It does not concern us so much, because there is no danger of our being arrested; but it did concern some of the citizens of my State who were imprisoned in Prussia until we confirmed that treaty, a fact not stated by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. My colleague on this floor had in his hand a letter received from Mr. Bancroft, saying "confirm the treaty if you want these men out of prison."

Mr. SUMNER. It was in Bavaria, the Senator will allow me to say.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator refused to allow me to correct him when he had the floor. He is very quick to intrude his correction upon others; and he would be very quick to demand the interference of all the powers of this Government in behalf of an arrested American citizen if he were black. But, sir, those arrested happen to be of another color, not a color which appeals to his sympathies, but a color that allows him to belittle their arrest and incarceration; that enables him to say here in the Senate that our Government have done everything that they could do; all that was necessary. It is true in his judgment, I have no doubt; for if you only write letters, if you only publish and utter productions of the brain, if you only present views, the honorable Senator is satisfied. Those are his means, except when the progress through the thoroughfares of the city or the country of an American citizen of African descent is involved. Then views are at once thrown to the dogs, and he demands the interference of the Government, the police authority; if it be a railroad company, repeal their acts of incorporation. No matter how much capital stands in the way, it may be $10,000,000 that is affected, repeal their acts at once! How dare they impiously set up their tyranny over one human being who is stamped with American citizenship?

Now, sir, I do not ask for all this on his part in behalf of American citizens of another class; but considering all that my friend has said from time to time of abolishing and abandoning all distinctions because of race or color I think he ought to be willing to come up to his own platform.

Mr. SUMNER. I am.

Mr. CONNESS. I think it ought to be conceded at this hour of the day that a white man is pretty nearly as good as a black man, behaving himself; and we are not asking the interposition of the Government in favor of those who did not behave themselves.

But I spoke of those citizens of the State of California, citizens of the United States, who were arrested and imprisoned in Germany. He tells me it is Bavaria. No, sir; the letter that I referred to was while the treaty with Prussia was pending, and if Mr. Bancroft was mistaken in his facts it is not my fault.

But, Mr. President, the question before the Senate now is exactly as stated by the Senator from Oregon. The law as proposed to be passed under the direction of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations amounts to nothing.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to correct the Senator. It amounts to a good deal. It takes from the President the power which he now has.

Mr. CONNESS. Very, well, sir; it amounts to this: it is an insult to every naturalized American citizen; it is an offense. My friend from Oregon proposes an amendment which would make it the duty of the Executive to take all civil means, and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations proposes now to emasculate that by reducing it to a mere suspension of diplomatic relations. Why, sir, it includes that. Are we to have none of the efforts of the Government in behalf of our citizens unjustly arrested and imprisoned abroad? I hope, without detaining the Senate any longer, that we shall not add to our too great delay upon these questions the offense and insult that the passage of this act would be as proposed by the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. I hesitate very much to say another word, and yet I think the Senate will pardon me if I make a brief reply to the charge so absolutely unjust of the Senator from California. He throws upon me the reproach of indifference to foreigners. Sir, I deny the imputation, and challenge comparison on this head with any Senator on this floor. Sir, you do not forget that more than ten years ago there was a storm that passed over this country which had a name more familiar than polite: the storm of Know-Nothingism. It was everywhere, and enveloped my own State. At that time I had the honor of holding the position which I now hold. Did I yield to this storm when it was carrying all before it? Sir, at that time I went down to Faneuil Hall, and in the presence of one of the largest audiences ever there assembled, and knowing well the prevailing sentiment, I made a speech vindicating the rights of emigrants to our country. I have that speech here now, and I will read a few sentences from it. This was on the 2d of November, 1855. Pardon me for reading this record of other days; but I am justified by the attacks to which I have been exposed. If any foreign-born citizen is disposed to hearken to the Senator from California impeaching me I ask him to bear in mind how I stood for his rights at another time, when there were fewer ready to stand for them than now. I read now from this forgotten speech, as reported at the time:

"The history of our country, in its humblest as well as most exalted spheres, testifies to the merits of foreigners. Their strong arms have helped furrow our broad territory with canals, and stretch in every direction the iron rail. They have filled our workshops, navigated our ships, and even tilled our fields. Go where you will, among the hardy sons of toil on land or sea, and there you will find industrious and faithful foreigners bending their muscles to the work. At the bar and in the high places of commerce you will find them. Enter the retreats of learning, and there you will find them, too, shedding upon our country the glory of science. Nor can any reflection be cast upon foreigners, claiming hospitality now, which will not glance at once upon the distinguished living and the illustrious dead—upon the Irish Montgomery, who perished for us at the gates of Quebec; upon Pulaski, the Pole, who perished for us at Savannah; upon De Kalb and Steuben, the generous Germans, who aided our weakness by their military experience; upon Paul Jones, the Scotchman, who lent his unsurpassed courage to the infant thunders of our Navy; also upon those great European liberators, Kosciuszko, of Poland, and La Fayette, of France, each of whom paid his earliest vows to liberty in our cause. Nor should this list be confined to military characters, so long as we gratefully cherish the name of Alexander Hamilton, who was born in the West Indies, and the name of Albert Gallatin, who was born in Switzerland, and never, to the close of his octogenarian career, lost the French accent of his boyhood—both of whom rendered civic services which may be commemorated among the victories of peace.

"Nor is the experience of our Republic peculiar. Where is the country or Power which must not inscribe the names of foreigners on its historic scroll? It was Christopher Columbus, of Genoa, who disclosed to Spain the New World; it was Magellan, of Portugal, sailing in the service of Spain, who first pressed with adventurous keel through those distant southern straits which now bear his name, and opened the way to the vast Pacific sea; and it was Cabot, the Venetian, who first conducted English enterprise to this North American continent. As in the triumph of discovery, so, also, in other fields have foreigners excelled, while serving States to which they were bound by no tie of birth. The Dutch Groenius, author of the sublime work, 'The Laws of Peace and War,' an exile from his own country, became the ambassador of Sweden; and in our own day, the Italian Pozzo di Borgo, turning his back upon his own country, has reached the most exalted diplomatic trusts in the jealous service of Russia. In the list of monarchs on the throne of England, not one has been more truly English than the Dutch William. In Holland, no ruler has equaled in renown the German William, Prince of Orange. In Russia, the German Catharine II takes a place among the most commanding sovereigns. And who of the Swedish monarchs was a better Swede than Bernadotte, the Frenchman; and what Frenchman was ever filled with aspirations for France more than the Italian Napoleon Bonaparte?"

Such was my argument for the rights of foreign-born citizens. To all of them I offered such welcome as I could:

"There are our broad lands, stretching toward the setting sun; let them come and take them. Ourselves the children of the pilgrims of a former generation, let us not turn from the pilgrims of the present. Let the home founded by our emigrant fathers continue open in its many mansions to the emigrants of to-day."

Sir, those were the words which I uttered in Faneuil Hall at a time when the opposition to foreigners was sweeping over the whole country. Others yielded to that tempest, but I did not yield. All my votes in this Chamber, from the first day that I entered it down to this time, have been in the same direction and for that welcome which I announced. Never have I missed an occasion to vote for their protection. Never shall I miss any such occasion. I am at this moment anxious that all the pending negotiations should proceed prosperously, to the end that the rights of our naturalized citizens may find adequate safeguard everywhere. Too studious of the law of nations, perhaps, to be willing to treat it with distrust or neglect, I look to that prevailing agency rather than to the more limited instrumentality of municipal law. It is the province of municipal law to determine rights at home; how a foreign-born person may be naturalized in our country; how he may be admitted to all the transcendent privileges of American citizenship; but it belongs to another system of law to determine what shall be his privileges should he return again to the country which gave him birth. We may by our declarations, by our diplomacy, by our policy, ay, sir, much more, by our treaties, fix all those rights in adamant. But the Senator seems to have no higher idea than to write these rights in the fleeting passions of party. My vote will never be wanting to elevate them above all such fitful condition, and to place them under the safeguard of international law, the only law which can bind two different Powers. Sir, the Senator from California shall not go before me; he shall not be more swift than I; I will not allow him to take one single step in advance of me. Be the person Irish or German or Chinese he shall have from me the same equal protection. Can the Senator say as much?

Mr. CONNESS. Just a word, sir. I did not doubt that the honorable Senator from Massachusetts could find a dissertation of his own on this subject. I do not know any subject upon which he might not conveniently find it; and I am not at all surprised that he found it by reaching his arm out from where he sits. But mark you, Mr. President, it is precisely as I stated it when I had the honor to address this body a few days since on this subject. A man cries out for food, and he offered him a stone; a man cries for raiment, and he offered him rags—words.

The honorable Senator was in favor of the rights of foreigners in this country. I never described the honorable Senator as a tyrant; I never described him as an illiberal man; but in my humble judgment, without desiring to condemn him, when American matters are brought into contact and into trial with foreign Powers he is not the man that I would select in that combat on that occasion. He is too apt then to give way and to let, as is the case to-day, our citizens wail and lament in prison. He cannot blot out these facts. They do exist, and they are as I have stated them. I would continue and say a few more words, but I am urged by every consideration not to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the committee before I vote on the amendment. I desire to know whether, in his opinion, this bill would not stand much better with the third section omitted?

Mr. SUMNER. I think it would.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to call attention to the character of that section as it now stands. It provides that in case a native or naturalized citizen of the United States is unlawfully held in a foreign country the President shall make demand for his release or for his relief; that if that release or relief shall be refused the President shall communicate the fact forthwith to Congress, in order that Congress may take such action as it chooses. That is the whole of this section. Now, what does that mean? It means that the President under this law is to do nothing, where an American citizen is unlawfully arrested or improperly held in a foreign country, except to ask for his discharge and release; and if it is refused, that he shall stand silently by until a session of Congress convenes, and then he shall send the documents to us; and I suppose we are to refer them to a committee, and after the lapse of some months, possibly, if the pressure of other business permits it, we shall take the matter up and give it due consideration; and then after Congress has laid down a rule of action for the Executive, the President is to proceed to do something or other further in the case.

I submit that that is mere child's play; that it is something worse; that the inevitable inference to be drawn from this section is that the President in one of these cases shall do nothing more than this law prescribes. In my judgment you had best leave him to the full and complete exercise of his executive authority under the Constitution and laws of the United States. For my part, therefore, whenever it is in order, I shall move to strike out this third section and add to the end of the second (because the bill will then simply be a declaratory statute, declaring our principle) what I suppose will be sufficient to accomplish our purpose. At the end of that section, after declaring that all citizens, whether native or naturalized, shall be entitled to equal rights and equal protection from the Government, I would add these words:

"And it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to exert all his constitutional powers under the Constitution and laws for their protection and relief, and to report promptly to Congress, from time to time, all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizen by the Government of any foreign country."

That will leave his whole constitutional power untouched, and it will simply be an admonition to him to act with energy to the full extent of his powers and report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That only applies to naturalized citizens.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Both.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator be good enough to read his substitute again?

Mr. BUCKALEW. "And it shall be the duty of the President."

Mr. SUMNER. You propose to strike out the whole section?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I propose to strike out the third section, and add these words at the end of the second.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; now let me hear them.

Mr. BUCKALEW. "And it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to exert all his constitutional powers for their protection and relief, and to report promptly to Congress from time to time all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizen by the Government of any foreign country."

Mr. SUMNER. That is worth all the third section many times over.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the second section confined to adopted citizens, or does it extend to all?

Mr. BUCKALEW. The second section is as follows:

"That all naturalized citizens of the United States, while in foreign States, shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens in like situation and circumstances."

I will modify my amendment so as to apply to both.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes; make it so as to apply to both, and it will be all right.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I believe I cannot move to strike out the third section, as there is an amendment to an amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves an amendment, and to that the Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment, which is first in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish simply to say that this proposed amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, of course, is very acceptable to the chairman of the committee, because it is circumlocution and attains nothing in point of fact. Now, sir, I do not see, if we mean anything by this legislation, why we cannot provide that it shall be the duty of the President to take some specific action in case an American citizen is wrongfully imprisoned in a foreign country. If we are not willing to make any such provision as that, then, of course, we are not willing to assume the responsibility of protecting American citizens abroad. It seems as though we were frightened at something; we are afraid of somebody. There appears to be danger that we may give offense to the governor of some little province in Europe or to some crowned head; and the American Congress puts itself in the attitude of being afraid to assert before the world that it will everywhere and under all circumstances protect the rights of its citizens.

The proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is simply to provide that the President shall use "all his constitutional powers." What are his constitutional powers? Are the duties of the Executive to be defined by law, or not? Are we not constantly in the practice of declaring by specific enactments what the duties of the Executive shall or shall not be in a given case? Why do we make any such laws? Why not provide in every act of legislation referring to the performance of Executive duty that he shall discharge whatever duty the Constitution devolves upon him, without pointing out specifically what he shall or shall not do?

This amendment of mine simply provides that he shall proceed to inquire into the case, and if it is ascertained that the citizen is wrongfully imprisoned make a demand for his release; and then that he shall use such means as may be necessary to obtain the release. The Senator from Massachusetts is alarmed because this amendment, as he says, proposes to put a dangerous power in the hands of the President. Are we afraid to trust the President with the power of protecting American citizens? Are we to suppose that he will wantonly and wickedly involve this nation in a war? Suppose the Senator was President and this law was in force, would he not act in accordance with the rules of international law? Does this authorize him to violate any law of nations, or to resort to any violent or forcible measures? He is to do all he can under the Constitution and laws in every way to secure the release of a citizen; and nothing more is required of him by this amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Oregon is unjust, I think, in the strictures he applies to those who prefer the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania to his own. I prefer that amendment, and I am sure he is unjust in applying those strictures to me. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, if I comprehend it, intends to invest the President with all the authority, and to enjoin upon him all the action which fitly attend the executive office; that he shall exercise all his constitutional powers. The Senator from Oregon appeals to those around him to know what those powers are. What appeal shall I make to him to define the powers proposed by his amendment? I submit to him that he has used language unknown to the legislative phraseology with which we are familiar; "all means not amounting to acts of war." What are they, I repeat? Are they acts which according to any law the President has any right to do?

I can suppose, if it were worth while, a hundred illustrations, confessedly not amounting to acts of war, and in a certain sense adapted to this purpose, which nobody would pretend for one moment the President had a right to do unless he was armed by legislative authority with the powers. Suppose, for example, the President should take it into his head to send abroad ambassadors under the name of commissioners, as one President in one instance asserted the right to do. Suppose he should send strolling groups or strolling individuals over Europe to conduct side-bar negotiations. Suppose he should expend moneys otherwise in such modes as he might think were conducive to the harmony of the nations and the establishment of the rights of American citizenship. They would not be acts of war, and yet they would fall within the spirit and within the letter of the amendment of the honorable Senator from Oregon.

If we want definition, if we want certainty, if we want something tangible, I submit to the honorable Senator from Oregon that although there is a dubious and unascertained element,

I grant, in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, it is infinitely more certain, and it is infinitely more defensible than his own proposition, because it does rest upon the Constitution of the United States, and upon functions derived from it, and definable by the analogies of the Constitution and the deductions to be drawn from it.

One word further, Mr. President, and I have done. I have a sincere wish, without yielding to the pros or the cons of sensation on this subject, to provide all that we can provide of correction for existing evils, of redress for existing grievances, of provisions against apprehensions of the future; and if I am not able to go as far as some Senators avow a willingness to go, it is because I believe the means proposed are illy or unwisely adapted to the end. I think the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania is wisely and appropriately adapted to the end in view; and when we have adopted it, if we shall adopt it, I think we shall have done all that by legislative means we can do in this behalf. Therefore, I hope the section as it stands may be stricken out, that the Senator from Oregon may allow the question to be put now—I know he can interpose his amendment—and that we shall adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SUMNER. For the present I withdraw the amendment, and let the question be taken on the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I wish to get a vote directly on the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his amendment, and the question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Now I suppose that is open to amendment. I move to strike out the third section and add to the second section the words which I send to the Chair. Perhaps the proposition should be divided.

Mr. CONNESS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not strictly in order.

Mr. CONNESS. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CONKLING. I shall vote against this amendment in order that we may reach the other amendment that I think better.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall do the same.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (when his name was called.) On this question I have paired with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS.]

Mr. WILSON, (when his name was called.) On this question, I have paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] otherwise I should vote for the amendment, and he against it.

The call of the roll having been concluded, The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there is not a quorum voting.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope not; let us get through with this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. We must adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I think we had better not adjourn; we can get a vote.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Is a motion to adjourn in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be in order as soon as the vote is announced.

Mr. CONKLING. There is a quorum here.

Mr. WILSON. I agreed to pair with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] He would vote against the amendment, and in order to make a quorum I will cast my vote that way.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORRIS,] if here, would vote for the amendment, and I against it. I now vote for it in order to make a quorum.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 15.

as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conness, Cragin, Harlan, Harris, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, Whyte, and Williams—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Corbett, Doolittle, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Rice, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Wade, Welch, and Yates—30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I inquire whether my amendment is now in order?

Mr. SUMNER. It would be as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania move to strike out the third section?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is in order.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move to strike out the third section, and add to the second section the words which I send to the Chair.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask the Clerk to read what I propose as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator proposed to add words to the second section.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Yes, sir; I desire them read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the second section of the bill, when it shall be in order, the following words:

And it shall be the duty of the President to exert all his powers under the Constitution and laws for the protection and relief of citizens of the United States abroad, and to report promptly to Congress from time to time all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizens by the Government of any foreign country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to strike out the third section of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken; and on the conclusion of the roll-call there was not a quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know whether I ought to vote.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No motion is in order till the result of the vote be announced.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I feel an embarrassment about voting under the circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No remarks are in order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have the vote announced. There is no use in staying here. I call for the announcement of the vote.

The result was announced as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Corbett, Doolittle, Harris, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Rice, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Willey—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conness, Cragin, Harlan, McDonald, Morgan, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Whyte, Williams, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Cameron, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Wade, Welch, and Yates—32.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote discloses the want of a quorum.

Mr. SUMNER. There is no quorum, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 22, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. MANSFIELD FRENCH.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

J. W. CLIFT, OF GEORGIA.

Mr. DAWES presented the credentials of J. W. Clift, claiming to be a Representative from the State of Georgia, and moved that they be referred to the Committee of Elections.

FRANCIS W. KELLOGG, OF ALABAMA.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Francis W. Kellogg, member-elect from Alabama, is now present, and I move that he be sworn in.

Mr. KELLOGG appeared at the Speaker's desk, and was duly qualified.

SIMEON CORLEY.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Elections, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1494) to relieve Simeon Corley, of South Carolina, from legal and political disabilities; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It provides that all legal and political disabilities imposed by the United States upon Simeon Corley, a citizen of South Carolina, be removed.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to put upon the record the following statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Honorable Speaker and other Members of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: This will certify that our friend and fellow-citizen, Simeon Corley, esq., of Lexington, Representative-elect from the third congressional district of South Carolina, is, and always has been, a true friend to the Union. He stands almost, or quite alone, as a native Carolinian who has a life record in opposition to slavery and secession. This, however, did not shield him from the rebel service, which he was compelled to enter as a conscript, but refused even to choose a company among friends, lest it might bear the semblance of volunteering. Being in feeble health, the hardships of the field soon reduced him to a mere skeleton, when, without his consent, his friends at home put him in nomination for a district office, in order to save his life, and at the same time take him out of the rebel service. He acquiesced in the nomination, but was defeated by a rebel preacher! This futile attempt to get out of the service shows, however, that, according to the letter of the oath of office, prescribed by the act of July 2, he has "sought office," and, therefore, he is compelled to rely upon your generosity for relief from the disability. But for that single act we know of no reason why he might not take the said oath, and we do hereby recommend him to your honorable body as a gentleman entirely worthy of your confidence and favor. Having been one of the first in the South to indorse the restoration policy of Congress, he has suffered a terrible proscription for his course, and to-day, in common with the rest of us, his property and life itself are staked upon the issue. We therefore plead with you to remove every impediment to the further prosecution of the work to which he has been called, and in the success of which the whole people are alike interested.

L. BOOZER,
Lieutenant Governor.
E. Q. HAYES,
Senator Lexington county.
G. A. LEWIS,
Representative Lexington county.
H. W. PURVIS,
Representative Lexington county.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me to move an amendment including the names of Michael Hahn, of Louisiana, and John Milledge, of Augusta, Georgia. Mr. Hahn is known to all members of Congress, but in reference to Mr. Milledge I ask that a statement may be read.

Mr. MAYNARD. What is the necessity for relieving Mr. Hahn from political disabilities? He was a member of this House after the passage of the act of July 2, 1862.

Mr. DAWES. I understand charges have been made against Mr. Hahn. I do not, however, know upon what grounds. He was a member of this House after 1862. I believe he participated in the raising of a rebel flag.

Mr. MAYNARD. Has Governor Hahn asked to be relieved?

Mr. DAWES. If there be any political disability to be removed from Governor Hahn, every one who knows him, every one who served with him here as I did, will have no objection to remove it.

Mr. WARD. Is the gentleman to whom the bill reported from the Committee of Elections refers elected as a member of Congress?

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MULLINS. Mr. Speaker, the other day, when the credentials of gentlemen from South Carolina were presented, I stated then that I withdrew any objection I had heretofore expressed in regard to them, having been informed that I was laboring under a mistake. I was then asked the name of the individual. The gentleman from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, informed me the gentleman to whom I made objection was then to be presented. Now I wish to explain in regard to the matter, and to say that the applicant who now seeks to be sworn in is the gentleman the evidence of whose participation in the rebellion I had before me; but I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that the man had within his bosom a burning light and fire of loyalty, but was compelled under the storm and rage of secession to bow to the stubborn will of the original secessionists, and could not take the part he did. It seems clear to my mind, from the declarations of the gentleman himself to me, that he was doing all he could to preserve the life of the loyal people in every manner that suggested itself as most compatible with reason and the circumstances of the case. Under these impressions, I am now satisfied that I was then right, but was in error as to which one it was to whom this evidence applied. I return my thanks to the chairman of the Committee of Elections for the privilege of righting myself.

Mr. DAWES. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I have known this Mr. Corley of South Carolina for at least twelve years. I have known him well. He was a strong and earnest Union man, and has always been such. In the midst of rebellion he was against secession and did all he could to resist it from the beginning of the war, maintaining his integrity as a Union man. I am glad to bear this testimony, and especially as he is a native of South Carolina. Those are the kind of men I like to see coming here to represent their States, and without regard to their politics, if they only love the Union and are consistent in its defense. He is a worthy and excellent man.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the Clerk to read the paper which I have sent to the desk in regard to Mr. Milledge, of Georgia. I wish it to go on record.

The Clerk read as follows:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, July 13, 1868.

To the Chairman of the Reconstruction Committee of the Congress of the United States of America:

The undersigned, John Milledge, of Augusta, Georgia, applies for the removal of disabilities attached to him under the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States and the reconstruction acts of Congress; said disabilities arising from the fact that, having been a member of the Legislature of Georgia, he took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and subsequently, during the rebellion, was a member of a police company, local in its duties, and thus rendered aid to the confederate States. He was an original Union man and opposed to secession in 1860, as he was to nullification in 1832. At the close of the rebellion he took the oaths required by the United States authorities, and in good faith gave his support and influence to the restoration of peace and good will.

He is now an ardent supporter of these several reconstruction acts passed by the Congress of the United States, adheres to the principles of the new constitution of the State of Georgia, worked to secure the election of Governor Bullock, to whose administration he intends to give his support.

JOHN MILLEDGE.

We, the undersigned, respectfully recommend the above application to the favorable consideration of Congress, and request prompt action thereon.

FOSTER BLODGETT,

Chairman Republican State Committee.

RUFUS B. BULLOCK,

Governor-Elect of Georgia.

I take great pleasure, from personal knowledge of Mr. Milledge, in urgently recommending the removal of the disability in his case, believing that such acts will tend greatly to produce proper sentiments, and advance the interests of reconstruction.

GEORGE G. MEADE,

Major General United States Army.

Mr. BROOKS. He ought to be pardoned.

Mr. NIBLACK. That is sufficient. We are satisfied on this side of the House.

Mr. DAWES. The occasion for removing the disability of Governor Hahn is this: he held the office of notary public before the war, and continued to hold it for some time under the confederate authorities. That brings him within the fourteenth article, and it is proper his disability should be removed. He is vouched for very strongly by my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] who commanded in that department, also by my colleague, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and by all who knew him in this House while he was a member. I call the previous question, and also the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLER. Did he hold any military office?

Mr. DAWES. None at all.

The SPEAKER. The fourteen amendment to the Constitution does not require the yeas and nays to be taken, only that there shall be a two-thirds vote shown by the record.

Mr. DAWES. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and call for a division.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. FARNSWORTH, to include the names of Mr. Hahn and Mr. Milledge, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and there were—ayes 95, noes 15.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the bill was passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "An act to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn."

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 1341) making appropriations and to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that that body had passed the following bill and joint resolutions, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 622) in relation to bridges across the Ohio river;

A joint resolution (S. No. 169) appealing to the Turkish Government in behalf of the people of Crete; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 104) relative to the ocean steamship service between the United States and China, as authorized by the act of Congress approved February 17, 1865.

INTERNAL TAX BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has been asked by many members as to whether the tax bill has been signed by the President. As there appears to be a doubt in regard to it the Chair has the official document in his hands, presented at the bar of the House day before yesterday by the President's Private Secretary, informing the House that he had signed forty-three bills, among which is the following: "House bill No. 1264, an act imposing taxes on distilled spirits and tobacco, and for other purposes, approved July 20, 1868."

Mr. COBB. I wish to state that I was informed not less than an hour ago by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who sent a special messenger to see whether this bill was approved, that the messenger came back and informed him that the act was not approved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only state that this is an official document presented by the President's Private Secretary, which is the only evidence given by the President to either branch of Congress of his signature to a bill. It is to be found in the Globe of to-day under the head of "Message from the President."

Mr. COBB. I have made the statement in order that members may understand it. It was also reported by the Secretary of the Treasury that it was not signed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated what is on the official record, the Journal of the House.

Mr. COBB. It seems that there is an error somewhere in regard to it.

CHARGES AGAINST JUDGE BUSTEED.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a question of privilege. I make the following report from the Committee on the Judiciary on the proposed impeachment of a judge of a United States court.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry C. Temple, of the State of Alabama, in which said Temple charges Richard Busteed, esq., judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Alabama, with official misconduct in office, report:

That the committee gave the memorialist a hearing in support of the charges made by him. The committee also gave Judge Busteed notice of the charges preferred against him, and informed him that the committee would hear him in the matter if he desired to be heard. Judge Busteed appeared before the committee, and made statements and explanations in vindication and in refutation of the charges. As the parties were not under oath the statements made are of no legal value. Judge Busteed desired an immediate investigation, but as it is impossible to enter upon it during the present session of Congress the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to investigate the charges against the character and official conduct of Richard Busteed, United States district judge of Alabama, with power to appoint a sub-committee, which shall have authority to administer the necessary oaths, to employ a stenographer, and send for persons and papers, and sit during the recess of Congress if deemed necessary.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELECTION CONTEST—HOGAN VS. PILE.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the report from the Committee of Elections in the case of Hogan vs. Pile, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] is entitled to the floor.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COOK. I yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.]

Mr. SPALDING. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I ask leave to make a personal explanation. It will only take me about four or five minutes.

No objection was made.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say a few words relating to what I observe reported in the Globe of the remarks of General GARFIELD and others with regard to what I said in debate on the passage of the five-twenty bill. I find that it is all taken from the report of Secretary McCulloch, which I had never read. I am, therefore, free to presume that what those gentlemen quoted rather than said is a total perversion of the truth. Had it not been introduced from so respectable a quarter in this House, it would not be too harsh, as there presented, to call it an absolute falsehood. I do not know that I should have taken any notice of what the various papers are repeating, some of them half rebel, some half secession, and more of them I suppose in the pay of the bondholders. I shall not now undertake to explain the whole of this matter, as I am too feeble, but I shall take occasion hereafter to expose the villainy of those who charge me with having said, on the passage of the five-twenty bill, that its bonds were payable in coin. The whole debate from which they quote, and all my remarks which they have cited, were made upon an entirely different bill, as might be seen by observing that I speak only of the payment of gold after twenty years, when the bill I was speaking of, as well as all other liabilities, were payable in coin, as no one doubted the resumption of specie payments. My speech was made upon the introduction of the "legal-tender bill," on which the interest for twenty years was to be paid in currency. No question of paying the interest in gold arose till some time after, when the bill had been passed by the House, sent to the Senate, returned, and went to a committee of conference, when for the first time the gold-bearing question was introduced, and yet all that these wise and truthful gentlemen have quoted from me took place in debate some weeks before the gold question, either principal or interest, had arisen in the House.

I only now wish to caution the public against putting faith in the fabrications of demagogues and usurers, and they will find that every word which I have asserted with regard to myself is true to the letter.

INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. On behalf of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] I ask that the amendments of the Senate to the appropriation bill for the benefit of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, on account of ill health.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. ANDERSON, on account of the sickness of his wife.

Mr. BROOKS asked and obtained leave of absence till September 17.

INDEX TO TAX LAW.

Mr. COOK. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAFLIN.]

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to prepare an index to the internal revenue act lately passed, and to have the same published in connection with the law.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEVEES OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SYPHER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the propriety of making the levees of the Mississippi a national highway, or otherwise so improving them as to protect them, at the expense and to the advantage of the public.

COURT OF CLAIMS—LOUISIANA.

Mr. SYPHER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 355) to extend to the State of Louisiana the provisions of an act of Congress, approved July 4, 1864, entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the armies of the United States;"

which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to offer a privileged resolution.

Mr. SPALDING. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. BROOMALL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SPALDING. I never withdraw my objections.

Mr. BROOMALL. It is a resolution relating to adjournment.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order.

ELECTION CONTEST—HOGAN VS. PILE.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the unfinished business pending at the adjournment last night, being the report of the Committee of Elections upon the contested-election case of John Hogan vs. William A. Pile, first congressional district of Missouri.

The resolution reported from the Committee of Elections is as follows:

Resolved, That William A. Pile is duly elected a member of this House from the first district of the State of Missouri.

Mr. KERR. I offer the following as a substitute for the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That John Hogan is duly elected a member of this House for the first district of the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That William A. Pile is not duly elected a member of this House from the first district of the State of Missouri.

The question was upon the substitute offered by Mr. KERR.

Mr. COOK. I wish to explain in a very few words the conclusions to which the Committee of Elections have arrived upon this question. I may say at the outset that the questions we have had to decide are mainly questions of fact, rather than questions of law, and they have required a very elaborate and careful investigation. And only those who have made such an investigation in regard to these questions of fact can determine as to the correctness of the conclusions of the committee. The majority for the sitting member in this district was 218 as returned by the returning officer. The election was held in certain election districts numbered from twenty-four to forty-two inclusive. The objection which was made by the contestant to the returns of the returning officer applies chiefly to districts numbered twenty-six, twenty-seven, twenty-eight, and thirty. In relation to district No. 30 the objection is first that the judges of the election used a copy of the certified list and not the certified list itself upon which to make their returns, which copy was not prepared by the proper officers, not prepared in accordance with law, and that the improper list was used for the purpose of allowing persons who were not registered nor named upon the certified list to vote fraudulently for the sitting member.

I wish to consider that question for a moment. The constitution of Missouri requires that—"The General Assembly shall immediately provide by law for a complete and uniform registration, by election districts, of the names of qualified voters in this State; which registration shall be evidence of the qualification of all registered voters to vote at any election thereafter held." * * *

"after which no person shall vote, unless his name shall have been registered at least ten days before the day of election."

The law of Missouri provides:

"Sec. 12. Immediately after the closing of such registry the officer of registration shall make and certify two fair copies, alphabetically arranged, of the names of the qualified voters, as ascertained and determined by said board, one of which he shall deposit with the clerk of the county court on or before the next ensuing Saturday, and the other he shall deliver at or before the hour of ten o'clock a. m. of that day, to some one of the persons who shall have been appointed to act as judges of the next ensuing general election in the election district for which the list was made, and shall take his receipt therefor." * * *

"The person to whom the said list shall have been delivered shall produce the same at the place of voting, and deliver it into the possession of the judges of the election at the time of opening the polls on the day of the ensuing general election."

"SEC. 13. The copy of said list so deposited with the clerk shall be subject to examination as other records of said court, but no such examination by any person not officially connected with the court shall be allowed, except in the presence of said clerk or his deputy."

"SEC. 14. The officers of registration shall, as soon as may be, deposit with said clerk the original books of registration, which shall be kept and preserved among the records of the court, except when otherwise disposed of as hereinafter directed."

"SEC. 17. When any person shall have voted, the judges of election shall, at the time, write opposite his name on the list the word 'voted.'"

When this registration was made it was made in the manner following: the lists were opened and the voters registered their own name in their own handwriting upon the list. A very large proportion of the voters of the thirtieth precinct were Germans, many of whom entered their names upon the lists in German script; some of them entered their names upon the list in English script, according to their idea of what their names would be in English. This list was copied by an English clerk, who made upon the certified list the nearest approach he could to the original entry made by the voter himself upon the original list. When the voting was done the voter came to the polls and announced his own name, which was taken by sound by the clerk of the elections. Hence it was impossible but that there should be variances between the original list and the certified list of voters. These variances are about as great between the voters' list and the certified list as there are between the certified list and the original list, the differences arising, undoubtedly, from the same causes.

In preparing this report I had the assistance of a German scholar, and as an illustration I have given in the report a fac simile of a name written upon the original registration in German script. That name is in English Helfrich. Upon the certified list it is copied according to its appearance rather than its sound, Lynfriz; and it appears on the voters' list as Helfrich. This is a sample of the manner in which many of these names were altered in being transcribed from the original list to the certified list, and from the certified list taken by sound and transcribed on the voters' list.

Now, when the election was held in precinct No. 30 it was found that the certified list was alphabetized only by the first letter of each name. Some hundreds of names beginning with a certain letter of the alphabet were arranged under that letter, with no attempt to systematize them. Hence it became apparent to the judges of election that the voting must be done very slowly if each name had to be found upon the certified list, imperfectly alphabetized as it was. They therefore caused to be prepared a copy of the certified list, but alphabetized by the two first letters of the names. It will be remembered that the certified list was numbered. By reference to this new list a name could be much sooner found than upon the certified list, and then by reference to the number it could be much more readily found upon the certified list. This list so prepared was used on the day of the election, as was also the certified list; they were used together. I am not going to refer to the testimony now to show that these were so used; but I affirm that they were so used, and that both these lists were used on the day of the election by the judges of election in precinct No. 30.

It is urged that the use of this copy of the certified list, thus alphabetized by the first two letters, was improper, and that the vote of the precinct should therefore be rejected. The committee have come to the conclusion that unless this copy of the certified list was made for purposes of fraud—if it was made only for the purpose of allowing the voting to take place with greater rapidity and in good faith, to enable the judges to find more readily the names upon the certified list—it was no more improper than it would have been to employ an expert clerk for the same purpose, and that the poll of that precinct ought not to be rejected for that reason.

But it is insisted that that new list was used for fraudulent purposes. I wish to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the testimony on that point. I have examined the testimony with great care, and I have entire confidence in the conclusion to which the committee have come upon that question. The number of names is precisely the same on each list. Hence, it is certain that the new list could not have been used for a fraudulent purpose, unless there is substituted upon the new list names which do not appear upon the certified list. Now, so far as the testimony of the witnesses goes, it appears by the testimony of three witnesses who have compared the list that they agree perfectly.

This new list, prepared on the eve of the election and alphabetized by the first two letters of each name, was never before the committee. The only manner in which we could test the question whether there were on that list names which were not upon the certified list was to see whether there were on the voters' list names which were not on the certified list and not on the original list. That examination we have made with great care, and we find that there is a variance in the spelling of 144 names, but the committee have no doubt as to 124 of these 144, that the names are identical. Sometimes the variances are very slight; sometimes they are greater; but on both the original and the certified list the residences of the voters are given; so that in cases of inconsiderable variance the residence determines the identity of the voter; and when we find that the original list and the voters' list agree, or the certified list and the voters' list agree, we can arrive with very great certainty at the identity of the individual. The committee have found 124 of these names out of the 144, leaving 20 which we have been unable to find. I find that 8 of the substitutions we made were wrong. They ought to be added to the 20, making 28. I affirm that the remaining names have been identified.

Now, sir, on the list of those voting for the contestant there were 76 names allowed, and of these names the contestant has furnished corresponding names for 67. Of those I find 8 voted in their own names; 4 are not pretended to be accounted for; 21 names are left wholly unaccounted for.

I wish, now, to refer to a statement of the minority report. It is as follows:

"But, singularly enough, they say, 'The committee are unable to find the names of those voting for the contestant.' 'German idioms,' 'bad spelling,' 'taking down names by sound,' 'copying names,' and 'consequent liability to mistake, none of these can be applied to our names voting for contestant furnished by contestant. They are all fraudulent votes, which the committee are unable to find registered, or even indicated by similar names.'"

I wish to say there is nothing in the committee's report to lead any one to the conclusion we had rejected any of these votes for the contestant; nor have we done so. What we do say is, that if the misspelled names are to be counted for contestant they should be for the sitting member. The same rule should be applied to both, and if the rule is fairly applied, whether these votes shall be counted or rejected, the sitting member is clearly elected. When you consider this poll contains 14,000 names of voters, and remember that when you change a German name into an English one by the sound merely you are liable to change the initial letter, it is not strange the sitting member or the contestant has been unable to find every name. We have found many cases where the initial letter has been changed.

The reason urged for the rejection of 18 votes for the sitting member in precinct No. 25 is that these voters were never registered. I only intend to state the conclusions of the committee, not the evidence in detail. It is alleged that this number of names on the voters' list was not found on the certified list, or on the original list. The committee have found the names of 17, from which ought to be deducted 1, which subsequent examination showed had voted in his own name, and it is therefore used properly as a substitute, leaving 16. This leaves only 2 votes for the sitting member in this list of 18 not fully accounted for.

In precinct No. 26 the number of voters' names given by contestant which are alleged to have been unregistered is 61; corresponding names found on registry list by committee, 52; unaccounted for, 9; names on voters' list voting for contestant not found in the same form on registry list, 56; corresponding names pointed out on registered list by contestant, 32; unaccounted for, 24. Precinct No. 27, number of names in voters' list voting for contestant, claimed to be unregistered, 47; number of names found by committee on registry list, 30; unaccounted for, 17; committee show on voters' list, 47; voters for contestant not registered in some form, corresponding names found by contestant, 22; unaccounted for, 25. Precinct No. 28, contestant's list, 41; found by committee, 39; unaccounted for, 8; committee's list of unregistered voters for contestant, 52; corresponding names given by contestant, 24; unaccounted for, 28.

I am aware, sir, that exception will be taken to the conclusions of the committee on these questions of fact. I only wish to say that the committee has considered these questions with great care. I am prepared to vindicate those conclusions of the committee in relation to each particular name on the lists which have been printed by the committee if the same shall be challenged.

The next question is in relation to the thirty-seventh precinct. In that precinct the certified list of registered voters was not returned to the county clerk as it ought to have been by the law. It is in proof before the committee that on the 3d of January next after the election this certified list had not been returned. The question presented to the committee was whether this precinct should be entirely rejected because the officer had neglected to make a return to the county clerk. The committee find a case which we believe to be entirely analogous to this. In the case of Brockenborough vs. Cabell, Contested-Election Cases, page 86, the committee say:

"The law of Florida requires that the return of votes given for a Representative in Congress shall be returned to the secretary of State in thirty days next after an election. Your committee deem the provisions of the law only directory, and are of opinion that the votes returned after the thirty days should be counted as well as those returned within that time; a different construction might lead to bad results and tend to defeat the will of the people; a different construction would permit a corrupt officer, to defeat the voice of a majority by his refusal to make the returns. It would subject the will of the majority to be defeated by an accidental loss of the returns."

That reasoning applies precisely to this case. To allow the rule contended for by the contestant would result in this: that if for two months subsequent to the election the officer should neglect to return a certified list to the proper office the election would be nullified. That would place it in the power of an officer to defeat the will of the people; or in case of the loss of the certified copy by any means the same result would follow. This would be directly contrary to the rule always adopted by the House in relation to such questions. The committee therefore refuse to reject the vote of the thirty-seventh precinct.

It is contended that the election precincts were arbitrarily arranged by the friends of the sitting member, and thereby a fair vote was absolutely prevented. In relation to that question I am of opinion myself that four of those precincts were so arranged that the whole number of votes could not be polled. But if those four precincts were rejected the result would be that the majority of the sitting member would be increased. Nor ought they to be rejected, because there is no evidence that they were so arranged for any fraudulent purpose, or for the purpose of preventing the polling of the vote.

It will be seen that the vote was polled under circumstances of very great difficulty. Searching for the names of foreigners on the list caused great delay. If the list had been properly alphabetized, the names might have been found and the votes given in. The whole number of votes in these precincts was much less than is often polled in precincts where only English names are to be found, and they are properly alphabetized. It was an error of the law which has been corrected by the Legislature of Missouri, but which operated to keep out about as many men who offered to vote for the sitting member as who offered to vote for the contestant. This is known from the fact that after sundown votes were received in three of these precincts. In two of them the sitting member received a majority, and in one of them the contestant received a majority of the votes cast after sundown. It is apparent that about as many friends of the sitting member as of the contestant were prevented from voting. Be this as it may, the Legislature of the State of Missouri gave to the county the right to arrange these voting precincts. They arranged them in their discretion. That arrangement cannot be revised by this House. If, indeed, there was such a fraudulent arrangement of voting precincts as to deprive the community of the right of suffrage, it might call for the setting aside of the election in the entire district; but such a state of facts was not made to appear before the committee. It was an experiment which worked badly, perhaps, but which has been remedied by the only competent authority.

I come now to the night voting in three precincts. In two of those precincts the sitting member received a majority, and in the other the contestant received a majority. In one precinct where the sitting member received 46 majority the vote was counted by the returning officers, and in the other two precincts the vote was rejected. The law of Missouri requires that the polls shall be held open until sunset. In the two precincts where the vote was rejected the polls were regularly closed under all the forms of law at sunset and were opened again with partial notice to the voters after sunset. In the other precinct the poll was not closed at sunset, but was continued open after sunset, and the sitting member received 46 majority in that precinct.

The committee have expressly refrained from deciding whether that 46 majority ought to be credited to the sitting member or not. Nor would it make any difference in the result whether it was counted or not. But they do decide that where the polls were closed at sunset and afterward opened on partial notice to the voters, the votes taken after that time cannot in any event be counted.

But, sir, it is alleged—and that is the last point to which I shall refer—that many men who were registered were not allowed to vote because their names were not found on the registry list. Now, the reason of that is apparent in what I have heretofore stated. The fact, which is true, that many men who were registered were refused an opportunity to vote, because their names could not be found, demonstrates the other proposition that the lists were so arranged that it was difficult to find the names, and that the names were so changed in spelling and sound as to render it very difficult to find them on the certified list. The contestant has presented a list of 129 men who were properly entitled to vote, but whose votes, it is alleged, were rejected by the judges of election. In reference to that matter I have only to say that upon a careful examination I find that as to a large number of the 129 it does not appear from the testimony for whom they would have voted if they had voted at all. It appears, also, that some of the men on this list of 129 actually did vote. The number of men who, it is proved, would have voted for the contestant, but were prevented from voting, was 71. Assuming their votes to have been improperly rejected, the number is too few to overcome the majority for the sitting member, after making all deductions. The committee, therefore, conclude that in any view of the case that can possibly be taken the sitting member is entitled to his seat.

Having stated as briefly as I can the reasons which have governed the action of the committee, I will leave the further discussion to the gentlemen personally interested.

At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. COOK offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the contestant be permitted to address the House in support of his claims to a seat, subject to the rules of the House.

Mr. HOGAN, (contestant.) Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the House for this permission given me to vindicate, not myself only, but the right of the people of the first congressional district of Missouri to be represented here by the man of their choice. I come to the investigation of this question with a desire not to inflict upon the House at this period of this session a lengthy argument, but merely to recur to some points which have been presented by the majority of the committee, as I conceive, without any wish to derogate from their integrity or character, presented under great misapprehension. I wish to correct those statements, to present a few points, and then leave the whole matter to the decision of this House of Representatives.

There are very many points in this case that might be presented to the consideration of this House. Under existing circumstances I design to confine myself to as few of them as will possibly give a succinct and tolerably clear idea of the nature of this contest. I am amazed that the learned gentlemen who compose the Committee of Elections, lawyers as they are, should assume for one moment, in the contemplation of the law and constitution of Missouri that it is in the power of anybody except those authorized by law to make lists of voters for any purpose. The constitution of Missouri is not one of my making, nor was it made by or in the interest of the party to which I belong. Nor was this registration made by us or for our interest, but made exclusively to preclude the votes of the majority, and to put the power of allowing votes into the hands of partisans constituting only a minority of the people of the State. It was so made that we—those I mean with whom I am connected in Missouri—should have nothing to say about it. I do not so much complain of the majority for doing that, they had the power if not the right. But the gentleman from the eighth district of Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN]—when my friend Mr. Switzler was trying, but unsuccessfully, to obtain his seat here—contended that the county of Callaway should be thrown out because the returns did not conform to the registration law of Missouri. He also arraigned the majority of the Committee of Elections for allowing a report in favor of Mr. Switzler, while the law of Missouri was not complied with.

Now, however, it is a horse of another color. There is another party now; and there is to be another tune played upon this "harp of a thousand strings." And now a palpable, direct, positive, well-known, and admitted violation of the law is merely a little bit of a matter to facilitate voting. And things are assumed in reference to which there is not one scintilla of evidence.

Now, why is it that in this thirtieth precinct such a terrible effort should be made to furnish a properly alphabetized voting list? The list furnished by the register was of just about the same character as the list furnished by the other registers of the district. So far as this book of testimony goes there is but one of them alphabetized on the second letter. There are four of them in which there were many more votes to be given than there were at this thirtieth precinct, where there is such an anxiety to get a list better alphabetized. Why was this done, and why the anxiety now to fix up this matter so as to conform to the wishes of the sitting member? The list was fixed up so that that vote could be polled in the interest of the party of the sitting member, and illegally increase his majority there.

Now, the law of the State of Missouri says that the sworn officers of the law, appointed by the Governor, shall make out this list of voters.

He comes forward and he makes it. It is furnished to these gentlemen according to the law.

Nor is it true in fact that he did not have ample time to prepare that list and to prepare it right. The election was held on the 6th of November. The certified list furnished to the county clerk is dated October 29, that is, six days before election, at least, the list was prepared. There was no time for the registrar to furnish the list; but there was ample time for outside parties to furnish it. Now, the law says explicitly that the registrar shall furnish this list and certify it. The registrar is the sworn officer whose duty it is to do this thing. No one else is allowed to do it. Will you in this House sanction the gathering together of a half dozen men in a private room a night or two before the election in order to fix up a list to vote by? By whom was this prepared? By the registrar? No, sir, not by the registrar. The registrar was not further off from the place where this private caucus was held than from here to the Senate Chamber. Yet while hours were being employed by these men in making up a voting list this sworn registering officer was not called to be present and see what was being done with his list. The House will please note this. Why the secret conclave of unknown persons for an illegal purpose? Why exclude therefrom their own partisan, their chosen sworn officer? Is it not palpable fraud and wrong were to be perpetrated by unsworn persons, hence they did not wish the presence of a lawful, a sworn officer?

But the gentleman from Illinois in his argument just now has said that there is no evidence that that list was not as fair and as complete as the one furnished by the registrar; but in the very same argument he showed that it was not; for he said that there were at least twenty-four men who voted there whose names he could not find upon that list, nor any substitutes therefor. How came they there? I say there are one hundred and fifty men voting there who are not on that list certified by the registering officer to the judges, and which list was remade by others; and the gentleman who makes the report admits that the names of twenty-five of them cannot be found after all the investigation he has given to this question. How did they get a chance to vote? Their names are not on the list furnished by the registrar, nor any name that is in any way analogous to them. On the original register you cannot find any name analogous to them. According to the constitution of Missouri no man who is not registered is allowed to vote. How did these twenty-five men vote? If they are not on the original, nor yet on the certified copy, how did they get to vote, unless their names are upon the list furnished by these outsiders, and which list was illegally used by the judges? The gentleman himself admits that there are twenty-five whose names he cannot find at all; and as to many more of them he does not find analogous names which should be so substituted; besides, some sixteen of those he thus substitutes voted in their own proper names, thus adding this many more to those not found.

Now, let me illustrate the analogy in some of these names. I furnished a list of names and the committee go to work and exemplify the names which they say are analogous to those that I furnished. Now, I desire to direct the attention of members to some of these names, and these not perhaps the worst, furnished by the committee in substitution for the names I charge as those of fraudulent voters. Here is an example. One man voted as "H'y Mullenhorse." The name they say this is intended for is "Henrich Killinghorst." Now, is there not a striking analogy between these two names? If a man came up and gave his name as Henrich Killinghorst, even though he spoke German, would any intelligent clerk write that name "H'y Mullenhorse." Is not this a very striking exemplification of the analogy of names? But they say that this man's name, when he voted, was taken down by the sound. Now, that is another one of the assumptions upon which the case of the sitting member rests. It is not so. Before the judge of election who receives the man's votes should be the certified list by which is determined the right of the man to vote. A man comes up and gives his name as Killinghorst. The judge looks over the list and does not find there the name of Killinghorst; but he does find on the certified list the name of "Heillinghorst." The man when he offers his vote says that his name is Killinghorst. The judge says to him "Is not your name Heillinghorst?" The man replies, "Yes, mein name is Heillinghorst." It is taken down as Heillinghorst. No, sir, it is taken down as Mullenhorse. The name voted is Mullenhorse, the name certified is Heillinghorst, and the name registered is Killinghorst! Which of these names is it that votes? Is it the right man or the wrong man? But I will not dwell upon this case.

I will give you another illustration. Here is the name of Reichard Bessery. Well, that is not his name at all. He ought to be a good voter, as he voted for the sitting member. It was necessary to find some name to substitute for him, and Richard Boeswetter is the man who called his name as Boeswetter, but who they say now is upon the certified list as Richard Basewetter. When they came to take down that man's name it is Richard Bessery. Is there anything analogous to it? Is it taken down from the sound? Here is another. A man comes up and votes as J. H. Gerheide; no such name is registered, but they admit this and say the name should be J. H. Woerheide, yet this "certified list" which is presumed to have been examined so as to see whether he is entitled to vote they say gives the name as G. H. Waerhard, yet after all the intelligent clerk writes this latter name J. H. Gerheide, and the committee say it was taken down by the sound. How likely!

Here is a worse case. Here is a man who votes as August Cuttman. I say that man is not to be found. Oh, no, says the sitting member, there is no such man in that district. Oh, no, says the committee, there is no such man as August Cuttman, but there is a name August Katlonder, spelled in certified list as Aug. Kothlander, and there is no doubt he is the man intended, this is August Cuttman, and do not you see it is misspelled. And so it goes through all these names until you come down to this one. Here is one name I find substituted for another. It is the name of Frank Somers. This shows the highest style of art in the substitution of names. I think the man who did this certainly could take out a patent for substituting names. They find Frank Somers on the list, and they find the name on the original registration as Frank Webster, who also writes his own name and no mistake, which certainly must mean Frank Somers, because he lives upon Webster street! The man who did that certainly can take out a patent. But it is worthy of remark, that there is no testimony going to prove that these were the men at all; it is mere naked assumption.

I give these as an illustration of the manner in which they substituted names, and while they substitute these names there are those for whom they make no substitution at all, but have counted them for the sitting member; that is to say, a man comes in and illegally votes, you substitute a name for him and then vote him for the sitting member. I do not see any use in contesting an election where fraudulent appliances like these are used. I invite investigation of this matter. When the sitting member made his proof as to substituting names I went over it and examined each case, and I found a number of names thus substituted had voted for themselves. I alleged that in my replication, but the committee did not take any notice of it in their report. I leave it to the House of Representatives whether, in view of this state of facts, there is no evidence there were fraudulent names added to that list at the precinct No. 30? At any rate, whether, if the House decides it cannot throw out that vote entirely, they will not throw out the fraudulent votes?

Another point in this case is the return or want of return from the thirty-seventh district. I do not intend to go very largely into this case at this period of the session. I do not intend to make an elaborate investigation of this matter. The committee allege there is no proper evidence a return has not been made from the thirty-seventh precinct, and even if it was it does not amount to anything. It cannot be constituted a means of depriving the people of their right to vote. The registration law of Missouri, section fourteen, says:

"The officers of registration shall, as soon as may be, deposit with said clerk the original books of registration, which shall be kept and preserved among the archives of the court."

Why is this? No man can vote in Missouri unless he takes the oath prescribed by the constitution. Any man who takes that oath falsely may be prosecuted by anybody for doing it, and his registration may be given in evidence. The constitution explicitly declares that the registration shall be the only evidence of the fact that a man is entitled to vote; and in order that that evidence may be had, the law provides that it shall be filed in the county clerk's office.

Now, I ask members of this House and the Committee of Elections how do they know that any man who voted at the thirty-seventh election precinct was a voter in Missouri. The law says he cannot vote unless he is registered. The law says the registration on affirmation or oath and certificate of the officer of registration are the only evidence that shall be had. The law says that that evidence shall be deposited in the county clerk's office. Yet the Committee of Elections now declare that there is no necessity for that. The law requires it, but what of it? I say that I do not know that a single man who voted in that thirty-seventh precinct was entitled to vote. I have no evidence that he could vote, and yet the committee count them all, as if the list of those voting were the highest evidence. Here is evidence in this record that the original registration, if ever made, was not where the law required it to be. There is nothing shown why it was not there. I leave that point, for I do not think it worth while now to dwell upon any of these questions.

I come now to the night vote. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] concedes that at three precincts a night vote was held. The law of Missouri does not allow a night vote. It says that the polls shall be open from sunrise till sunset. "Well, but," says the gentleman, "the polls closed at two places, and there is evidence that while the sitting member had a majority at two of these precincts, the contestant had a majority at one." They do not say anything about the legality of the vote. That I may not misrepresent them, I will quote what the committee say, which is substantially what the gentleman from Illinois just now said:

"The law of Missouri provides that the polls shall be kept open until sunset. The committee expressly refrain from deciding whether the votes taken in precinct No. 26 after sunset should be counted or not. The law of Missouri requires that the polls should be kept open until sunset; whether this law makes it imperative that the polls should be closed at sunset it is not necessary to decide, as the decision cannot affect the result of this case."

Now, the committee say that they will refrain from deciding this matter. They do not recognize its legality. But, sir, the committee do not throw out one of these night votes given for the sitting member. They count them all just as though they were legal. The secretary of State, when he made up his certificate in this case, recognized that this was a different thing from any other vote. I have here the certificate, in which he states it thus:

"For Congress, first district, William A. Pile received 6,587 votes before sunset; 141 votes after sunset."

Is that the usual certificate?

"John Hogan received 6,417 votes before sunset; 93 after sunset."

Now, why that unusual form? Why stated in that way? There is nothing of the kind in reference to the second district, nor to any other district. The night vote was not recognized by the secretary of State as a legal and authoritative vote. The committee say they do not recognize this, and yet they are so anxious to be fair in reference to this thing that, while not recognizing it as legal, they count it for the sitting member! Now, why is it done? The committee say it will not make any difference in the count. I want the count to show fairly whether it makes a difference or not; and if I were upon the Committee of Elections I would either decide that it should be counted or should not. And if it is not counted that leaves the majority of the sitting member 170. I would be glad if the members of the House who are present would bear in mind the fact that while there was a majority of 48 votes given for the sitting member at precinct twenty-six, those 48 votes taken from his majority would leave him only a majority of 170.

But the gentleman says that at the twenty-seventh precinct the majority of the night vote was also for the sitting member. One man testifies that Mr. Pile's majority in that precinct was about 8. Another testifies that of 487 votes "pretty much all of them were Hogan votes." The man who makes that statement was one of the judges, the one who put all the ballots in the box, and he says that the night vote was neither opened nor counted, but he says that he knew all the men, he took in all the votes, and pretty much all of them were Hogan votes, and that is the reason why they were not counted. If there had been a majority there for William A. Pile, his friends, the majority of the judges, would have counted the night vote there, as they counted it in the twenty-sixth precinct. But because there was some 400 majority there for me, which majority would have elected me, it was not counted, and although Mr. Gambs, one of the friends of the sitting member, and one of the judges there, says that there was a majority of 8 for Pile, the clerk of the election swears that it was not counted at all, and the other judge of election swears it was not counted at all. And if it was counted at all, it was counted by Henry Gambs in his own private room at his home, after the election was over, after the judges had separated, and there was nobody there to see how he counted it, just as the thing was done at the thirtieth precinct, without the presence either of the register, the judges of election, the clerk, or anybody else known to the law.

Now, sir, I wish to say, in concluding this part of the argument—and I wish the members of the House would remember it when I say it—that of all the registering officers in the first congressional district of Missouri not one of them belonged to the party that I belong to. They were all, each and every one, in the interest of the sitting member; and of the judges of election there were but five or six places in which one of the judges of election was allowed in my interest. They were all in the interest of the sitting member. If, then, there were fraudulent votes polled on my side, he must be a smart man who got in these fraudulent votes against the registering officers, against the judges of election and the clerks who took in the votes, and everybody else.

But, sir, an allusion was made by the learned gentleman who opened the case to the fact that many men could not be found registered because their names were misspelt upon the register. Why, sir, they were left off wholly, bodily—left off of the certified list—and they were left off on one side only. Listen to what is said by one of these judges in the twenty-eighth precinct, Mr. John P. Cassily, and I merely quote it in order to justify myself in what I say:

"What struck me as rather peculiar was that the class of names that seemed to be dropped from the registry, in at least forty-eight cases out of fifty, were Irish, and appeared to be Hogan men. I have lived a long time, some twenty-five years, in that ward, and am acquainted with many of the voters in the tenth ward, and a portion of the ninth, and of course knew the status of most or many of the men there known as Radicals and Conservatives, and, with two exceptions—with simply two exceptions—I do not know of a Radical being dropped off the book, and it came more severely on the Hogan portion of the community; that is all on that subject."

And yet in that precinct there were nearly 300 votes left off the list certified to the judges by the registrars, declaring and certifying that they furnished a "true copy" of the list. So it was in almost every precinct. Not only were names changed, but names were left off. And they were changed not for the reason assigned by the learned gentleman who opened the case, because they were German names, written in German text. No, sir; the names left off or changed were in the fewest possible instances German. They were Irish and English and American. Those were the names that were left off. Why were they left off? Because it was claimed that the Germans were chiefly the friends of the sitting member. It was supposed that the Germans would vote in his interest, whereas the Irishmen would vote in mine.

Four hundred Irish names are left off the certified list. I do not find that more than twenty German names were left off, and many of them were my friends, for I had about as many friends among the Germans as my competitor had. But those names were changed purposely; they were changed because their political status was known; because it was well known that if they voted I would be elected by a large majority. The object was to deprive the people of their right of suffrage, and to perpetrate upon them this terrible fraud. That is the reason of it; that is the idiom of the German language that caused them to be left off. There may be a man by the name of Johann Lynfriz, who may be called John Helfrich. There may be some three or four cases of that kind, but they are very few and far between. But why is Dennis Maloney spelled Nehoney, or James Hagan spelled Heigin, or John Tucker spelled Tugher, and many others whom I might refer to; were they also spelled in German text and difficulty found in their translation?

And in ninety-nine out of every hundred cases it was not the German whose name was misspelled, because the registrars were nearly all of them of German extraction. The very men who registered the voters in the fourth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth wards were themselves of German extraction. And they could understand the idiom of the German just about as well as the learned gentleman who has preceded me, [Mr. Cook,] or than my competitor upon this floor. They were Germans themselves; they read the German language aright; they left off the American and Irish names, as Dr. Cassily says here, because they knew them, and knew for whom they were going to vote.

If on a fair contest before the people of the first congressional district of Missouri I was beaten by one single vote, I do not so esteem a place even in this honorable House; I do not so much desire political position and preferment as to make a contest here in order to trouble this House about such a matter. But when nearly four thousand of the people of that district are deprived of their rights; when hundreds of them are robbed of their right to vote after they had registered their names, and then when they are not allowed to vote because it is alleged that their names are not to be found upon the list there, although they are there, and when violations of law in Missouri are perpetrated with impunity, I come here, who have been against that law, who believe it to be wrong and iniquitous and designed to do wrong to the people of Missouri, yet as it is the law, and while it is the law, I demand not only of my own political friends, but of you, gentlemen from Missouri who have been elected under this law. I demand of you to vindicate your own law, and not allow such fraud and chicanery and wrong to be perpetrated not only upon me and my people, but upon the right of the elective franchise, that palladium of American liberty. And I come to the House of Representatives to vindicate us in this matter.

I know that this House does not possess the power to arrange voting places. The Legislature of Missouri left that to the county courts. But has this House no right to investigate where there are palpable violations of right and justice? Must this House acquiesce in the illegal deprivation of the franchise of several thousand legal voters, to whom partisan judges will not furnish sufficient voting places? The gentleman who represents the majority of the committee has just said this House could say that because of this wrong there was no fair or legal election held in that district, and send it back again to the people. I say that if I am not elected a member from the first district of Missouri, then there was nobody elected as such member; and this House ought to declare the election void, not only because of this outrageous arrangement, but because nearly one entire half of the legal vote of this entire congressional district was required to vote at four precincts. Mark me, gentlemen, mark what I state, for I speak deliberately about it. Here is a congressional district which has but twenty-one voting places allowed to it; in the first place only twenty-one, an entire congressional district embracing twenty-one places at which the people are to vote, and yet one half of the whole number of voters, less six hundred, are crowded into four voting places. How would any gentleman here like to be fixed in that way? I ask members here how would you like any county court or variety of county courts so to arrange the voting places that you could not get half your vote in? Sir, "it is a long lane that has no turning." You may be in high power to-day, you may establish precedents which others may follow, you may declare that you will not allow anything to be done in reference to such a case as this; but the adage is, "It is a long lane which has no turning;" and these very things may be brought home upon you before you are aware.

My friend from Illinois, [Mr. Cook,] who represents the committee on this occasion, a gentleman whom I have known for many years, says that all that the House can do in such a case as this would be to declare that the election was void; that it cannot purge the election of its frauds. I know that you cannot change the voting places; but, sir, you can look at the facts in reference to these things and investigate them.

But, sir, I must hasten on. I do not want to occupy any longer time than may be necessary. I have made these statements to the House that members may understand the facts of this whole matter. I desire now to call attention to another statement made by the committee. The committee say that in the registry all these names were numbered. Sir, in all this book there is found but one case, and that the twenty-first precinct, where the original registration is numbered; no evidence of a single name being numbered except there in the original registration. The names are taken down promiscuously as they come; and there are but two even of the certified lists that are numbered. Why, then, do the committee assume that it was easy to ascertain the identity of the voters because the names were numbered? I have gone over this entire book of evidence; I have examined the whole case; I have labored honestly and faithfully to find every man who was fairly and legally registered. I do not want to count on my side any vote which was cast contrary to the law of Missouri. I desire that the law of Missouri, while it remains in force, shall be honestly and faithfully complied with. I shall do all I can to have that law repealed or changed; but I am not in favor of violating it and yet professing to be its friend.

But, sir, not only have the committee gone over the list that I gave them of those who in various precincts had not been registered, and substitute therefor other names, intended, as they assume, for the same persons; but, sir, I find that in many of these cases, while they have professed to find names corresponding with those registered, have in many cases omitted names entirely, finding no substitutes, and in some cases have omitted entirely the names I cited. Now, I ask in all candor and fairness this question: when the committee could not find names to substitute for those that I gave them as the names of fraudulent voters, why did they not deduct that number from the sitting member's majority—one hundred and seventy, if they leave out the night vote, are all that he professes to have after all the frauds perpetrated in the registration, and by means of the certified list; yet the committee do not deduct even those. The minority of the committee, in making up their report in reference to this matter, have shown that this number, deducted from the vote claimed for the sitting member, would leave him with a minority. But the committee did not count for me the votes of those who I showed were registered, and who came up and swore they would vote for me, but who were not permitted to do so because their names were omitted from the list. Why was that omission made? I gave the committee a list of every man's name, with the page of the book on which will be found his affidavit that he went up to the judges, offered to vote, waiting in line in many cases six or eight hours to get the opportunity to vote; and yet when they reached the polls these men were coolly told by the judges of the election, "You cannot vote; we do not find your name here." The man having been a duly registered legal voter, but a fraudulent judge may have refused to take his vote, or the fraud of a registrar, in changing his name or entirely omitting it from the list, precluded its being received. And this is called honesty in election. This is done, too, by the party who demand the ballot for the protection of the freeman. Here the registered voter is placed at the mercy of a registrar who will "certify as true" a list from which he omits the names of one hundred or more voters, because they do not belong to his party!

Yet the Committee of Elections do not give me any credit for these votes. Never in the history of this Government has it occurred that such an allowance has not been given. Why is it not done in this case? Why is it votes confessedly fraudulent are counted for the sitting member? Why is it votes honestly given and illegally rejected are not counted for me? Is it because he belongs to your party and I do not? Yet you claim to be the party of great moral ideas; yes, and seek to sustain this by such fraudulent appliances as I have been commenting upon; but assuredly, Mr. Speaker, these fraudulent triumphs will be but short-lived; the people will not be always cheated.

But, sir, the committee allude to another thing. In closing the argument in my case before the committee I presented the affidavits of seventy-two men from one of the precincts in that district that they had voted for me. Every one of them was a legal voter, and yet every one of them was counted for the sitting member. What does the committee say in relation to that? I will read:

"During his concluding argument before the committee the contestant presented the affidavits of forty-two persons showing that they voted for him, and it is insisted that the poll-books show that each of these persons were counted for the sitting member."

"The committee cannot consider these affidavits as evidence, because it was admitted by contestant that the affidavits were wholly ex parte and taken without any notice whatever having been given to the sitting member, and because the same were taken without any order having been made for that purpose after the time allowed by law for the taking of the proof had expired."

"If, however, the testimony was admissible it would be very far from conclusive, because the poll-books as printed show that a large number of persons, and among them a number of these affidavits, voted for both the contestant and the sitting member."

It ought to be seventy-two instead of forty-two. I suppose it is a typographical mistake.

Sir, I do not like flatly to contradict the Committee of Elections, but I say that it is not so. There is not one of those 72 names, honorable, high-minded, intelligent gentlemen, in the twenty-third precinct, who does not swear they voted for me at that election, and yet there is not one of their votes counted for me in this record. I have since had 10 more names, making 82. I saw some seventy others when I was at home, who told me they would swear they did not vote for William A. Pile. They said, "What is the use of making an affidavit of that? the House of Representatives does not care." Such is the character you have got. "The House of Representatives does not care whether you are elected by 500 majority or not; they intend to perpetrate this fraud." I told them no; that I did not believe the House of Representatives intended to carry out any such fraudulent purpose; but they were not disposed to send their names here appended to an affidavit. But I got 82; and here they are. Here are the affidavits of 82 men, equal to any in St. Louis, lawyers, doctors, merchants, mechanics, bankers, and business men, all swearing that they gave their votes for me. Still, by chicanery and fraud, these votes are every one counted for the sitting member, and assist in making his assumed 170 majority. If taken from him it leaves him but 88, and added to my vote about of itself elects me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COOK. I move that the gentleman's time be extended.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. HOGAN. Ten minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOGAN. Now, sir, those 82 names, not one of whom voted for him, not one of whom are counted for me, are every one counted for him. Take 82 from him and add them to me, and it will overbalance his 170 majority as made out by the committee. There are 100 more votes that were fraudulently transferred to him in this same precinct. I ask the House to contemplate this condition of things. You are here to judge of the right. You are here to act on honor and principle. You are here honorable men representing an honest constituency. Are you, then, going to sustain frauds like this? Are you going to retain among you a man who comes here on votes given for another but transferred to him? This done, too, in one of the most intelligent precincts in the district, and of the best known men, men whose political status is as well known as any in the city. I assume that if done there, if such well known votes are transferred from me to him, doubtless the same thing has been done in hundreds of other cases in other parts of the city, of men whose political opinions are not so thoroughly known. Here is "ballot stuffing" with a vengeance by the advocates of moral ideas. Is this the way you expect in the future to succeed? We shall endeavor to watch your manipulations.

I leave that point. I have a little calculation here. I presented 129 names of men who voted for me, but were illegally refused their votes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] says that some of them did not say they voted for me. Well, that is so; some of them did not say they voted for me. They were not asked. But, sir, they were my friends, they were all brought up by me; their testimony is presented on my side of the evidence, and the fair presumption is that they did vote for me. It was but an omission of the lawyers who attended to my case who did not ask them whether they did or not vote for me.

But there are more; there are, perhaps, 8 or 10 of that class out of 129, and there are 25 more who were deprived of their right to vote because the registration officer was himself a candidate for office, and he knew they would not vote for him, hence rejected them. But I will put here on paper this simple statement, and gentlemen, if they please, can recur to it and see how the matter is. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] admitted that the night vote was counted. Now, I take off that vote. In precinct No. 25 the gentleman does furnish the names of substitutes for those that I furnished. He furnishes all, he says, except 4; at precinct No. 26, all except 8; at precinct No. 27, all except 20; at precinct No. 28, all except 6. Now, the gentleman admits that there were many of the names given that were claimed by the sitting member and by the gentleman to be substituted for names improperly voted, who had voted in their own names. I gave that list, amounting to some 25. I take this as not being the men that it is alleged they should be substituted for, who voted in their own names, and these, with the night vote, and the vote admitted not to be found at the thirtieth precinct, makes 137. That leaves the majority of the sitting member 81.

Now, sir, take the vote refused for me at the different precincts which I give here, amounting to 129, and then take the 25 who were improperly rejected by the registration officers, who were honestly and fairly entitled to registration, and who did vote for me, and it leaves me a majority in the district on this view alone of over 70, independent of all other matters. I am elected by this showing independently of the 82 men who swear they voted for me and yet are counted for the sitting member. And this is by what is admitted in the report of the majority of the committee, and what they omitted to allow, yet in the verbal statement just made by the member it is clear was an accidental omission. That has been admitted to be proper testimony in the case of Vallandigham vs. Campbell, and in the case of the broad seal of New Jersey, where the right of the voter to designate for whom he voted is held by this House and by the Committee of Elections. Those votes ought in all fairness to be counted for me. This is independent of all these other precincts. I could show you where 25 votes, which by this testimony were cast for me were laid aside and not counted at all by the judges of one of the precincts. I could show you by the testimony of other witnesses here that 153 votes were laid aside and not counted by the judges, mostly given for me. I could show you various fraudulent appliances in this transaction, but my time is nearly out.

I do not want to obtrude upon the House, who have shown me so much favor; but I will just say in conclusion that I have served with many, if not most of the members on this floor, and I know they are high-minded, intelligent men. I believe I have so demeaned myself as to have the respect and confidence of most of those with whom I served in the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I assure you upon my honor as a man that if I did not believe I was honestly elected to this House I would never have attempted to make a contest here. You cannot pay me for the value of my labor. You cannot pay me for the time that I have spent. You cannot pay me any pecuniary consideration that would remunerate me for my efforts in this case to attain the honorable position to which I know I was honorably elected, but by fraud deprived of. Now, I say to you, you have got to pass upon this question; you have got to decide it finally; you have got to say whether you will rise above party considerations and decide it according to right and justice. A pure ballot-box is the safeguard of our institutions. What matters though your majority of three fourths or more in this House be reduced by one. Must party drag you down so low as to vote to retain one among you whom you all must recognize is here by fraud? By so doing you all become parties to the fraud. He occupies one of your seats here as an equal. You were, I assume, honestly elected; he was not. You represent the will of your constituents when you vote and speak; he does not. If I was not elected, surely he was not; yet will you still, because he is of your party, permit him to occupy this seat obtained by these fraudulent means, and thus give it your sanction? I appeal to your honor, your love of country, of right, of fairness, of a pure and honest ballot, one time during this Congress to rise above party and to the dignity of statesmen and do justice to a defrauded constituency, and to one who, differing with you honestly, has still endeavored to demean himself honorably among you. Sincerely thanking you for the courtesy you have shown me, I leave this case with you.

[Here the hammer fell.]

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BANKS. I rise to a privileged motion. One hour having been devoted to the consideration of reports of committees, I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 72, noes 38.

Mr. CULLOM. As a great many members are absent, supposing the election case would be continued, I demand the yeas and nays, and call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to; and the House proceeded to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

The first business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 941) to amend certain acts in relation to the Navy and Marine corps.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION LAWS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions.

Mr. PERHAM. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and that a conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Mr. PERHAM, Mr. POLSLEY, and Mr. TRIMBLE of Kentucky, managers of the conference on the part of the House.

POSTAL LAWS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Mr. FARNSWORTH, Mr. FERRY, and Mr. JOHNSON managers of the conference on the part of the House.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867.

Mr. BANKS. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and that a committee of conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out the first section after the enacting clause, as follows: "That the assent of Congress is hereby given to the stipulations of said treaty."

Strike out the enacting clause of the second section.

Strike out the preamble of the bill in the following words: "Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that in consideration of the cession by the emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000 in coin; and whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas the subjects thus embraced in the stipulations of said treaty are among the subjects which by the Constitution of the United States are submitted to the power of Congress and over which Congress has jurisdiction, and it being for such reason necessary that the consent of Congress should be given to the said stipulations before the same can have full force and effect, having taken into consideration the said treaty, and approving of the stipulations therein, to the end that the same may be carried into effect: Therefore."

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, being upon Mr. BANK'S motion, to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. CULLOM demanded the yeas and nays, and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. BANKS, Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, and Mr. RANDALL, managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ARSENALS AT ST. LOUIS, ETC., MISSOURI.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes.

The amendments of the Senate were read as follows:

In line eight of section one, strike out "first," after "Missouri," in line nine, insert "except the westernmost six acres thereof," and strike out all after line fourteen, as follows: "Second. That portion of the military reservation known as Fort Leavenworth, which lies on the east side of the Missouri river, together with that portion of said reservation situated on the west side of the Missouri river, which lies between the city limits of Leavenworth City and a line commencing on the Missouri river at the mouth of Corral ravine, and running parallel with the south line of said reservation to its western boundary;" so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to sell, at such time and in such manner as he may deem most advantageous to the interests of the Government, subject to the provisions herein-after contained, the following military reservations and public property, namely: the ground now occupied by the St. Louis arsenal, in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, except the westernmost six acres thereof, and that occupied by the United States arsenal situated at Liberty, Missouri, together with such buildings, machinery, and other property appertaining thereto as cannot be advantageously employed in the construction or improvement of other arsenals or military posts.

In section two after the word "arsenal," in line two, insert "except the westernmost six acres thereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the ground occupied by the St. Louis arsenal, except the westernmost six acres thereof, shall be divided into blocks and lots of convenient size for building purposes, with public streets, conforming, as near as may be without detriment to the interest of the Government in the sale, to the public streets of the city of St. Louis adjoining said grounds; a plat of this division, made in accordance with the laws of the State of Missouri, shall be filed with the proper officer in the city of St. Louis; and the said lots shall be sold separately, at public auction, to the highest bidder, after thirty days' notice by advertisement in at least three daily papers in the city of St. Louis; payment to be made one third in cash, the remainder in one and two years, with six per cent. interest per annum, secured by deed of trust on the lots sold. The stone wall surrounding said arsenal shall be sold in sections not exceeding one hundred feet in length.

Insert as a new section, the following:

And be it further enacted, That the westernmost six acres of the tract of ground occupied by the said St. Louis arsenal, is hereby granted to the city of St. Louis, to be by it held as a public ground forever, open to the use of the public as a place of public resort, and for no other use whatever, and without any power in said city to make any disposition of the same, or any part thereof, for any private use whatever: Provided, however, That this grant is upon the express condition that the said city or the association formed and now existing in the State of Missouri for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of the late Brigadier General Nathaniel Lyon, shall, within three years after the passage of this act, complete the erection upon the said six acres of such a monument, upon a plan and of a character to be approved by the President of the United States; in default whereof this grant shall be null and void.

In lines two and three of section three, strike out the words "and that part of the Fort Leavenworth reservation specified in section first;" and in lines nine, ten, eleven, and twelve, strike out the following proviso: "Provided, That no part of Fort Leavenworth reservation west of the Missouri river shall be sold in lots exceeding ten acres each, but shall be sold in lots of half an acre, separately if desired by purchasers;" so as to make it read:

And be it further enacted, That the grounds occupied by the Liberty arsenal shall be sold at public auction, after due notice by public advertisement of the time and place of said sale, in such parcels, blocks, and lots as may be deemed most advantageous to the interest of the Government, by the Secretary of War, upon the terms and conditions as to payment specified in the previous section.

Mr. PILE. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. COBB. I would like to have the original bill read.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent; but only the amendments of the Senate are now before the House.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I would inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] if that portion of the bill relating to the sale of the Fort Leavenworth reservation has been stricken out?

Mr. PILE. It has been, for the reason that a bill subsequently passed the House and the Senate, and became a law, providing for the sale of that portion of the Fort Leavenworth reservation upon which the coal lands are situated. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. PILE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOYAL CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 1876, for the relief of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

The amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

And provided also, That the bonds of the State of Indiana held by the United States shall not be sold under the provisions of this act.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The question was taken upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and it was concurred in.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTION.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 541, making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution.

The first amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, for the purpose hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869:

Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia:

For the support, clothing, medical and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government hospital for the insane, including $500 for books, stationery, and incidental expenses, $30,500.

For finishing, furnishing, lighting, and heating the unfinished part of the east wing of the main hospital edifice, $7,000.

Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb: For the support of the institution, including $1,000 for books and illustrative apparatus, $25,000.

For the proper inclosure, improvement, and enlargement of the grounds of the institution, in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, $5,600.

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum:

For the support of the asylum, over and above the probable amount which will be received from independent or pay patients, $15,000.

For the completion of the Providence Hospital in Washington city, District of Columbia, $30,000.

For the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, $10,000.

For care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The second amendment of the Senate was to add to the title of the bill the words "and for other purposes;" so that it would read:

An act making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The first amendment makes an appropriation, which, under the rule, must receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole. I therefore move that the amendments of the Senate to this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole has priority of a motion to refer to a standing committee of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole will not be agreed to. We have had this same subject substantially under consideration in Committee of the Whole once already.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Should these amendments of the Senate to this bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, when they shall have been reported back to the House, must they not then receive their first consideration in the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. They must if the point be then made; but at that time a motion to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole from their consideration may be in order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All I desire is to have an opportunity to discuss and have a separate vote on some of the amendments.

Mr. SPALDING. If the gentleman will withdraw his motion to refer to the Committee of the Whole, we can arrange it in the committee-room so as to give him the opportunity he desires.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will agree to give me time to state some objections I will withdraw the motion. I expect the bill will pass.

Mr. SPALDING. I will agree to that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs upon the motion to refer to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

POST ROUTES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post routes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It is not necessary, I presume, to read those amendments; they simply fix certain post routes. I move that the House concur.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRESENTATION OF BILLS TO PRESIDENT, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 366) regulating the presentation of bills to the President of the United States and the return of the same; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides in the first section that the ten days mentioned in section seven of article one of the Constitution, within which the President of the United States is required to return to the House in which it originated any bill not approved by him shall be held and construed to be ten calendar days (Sundays excepted) next after the day of the presentation of any such bill to him; and the adjournment of Congress which shall prevent the return of any such bill by the President to that House in which it originated, shall be held and construed to be the final adjournment of a session, and not an adjournment of either or both Houses of Congress, acting by themselves or with the consent of each other, as provided for in the Constitution, to a particular day.

It further provides that if at any time within the aforesaid ten days the President shall desire to return a bill to the House in which it originated or to send a message to such House that he has signed the same, when such House is not sitting, it shall be lawful for him to return such bill or send such message to the office of the Secretary of the Senate, or Clerk of the House of Representatives, as the case may be, and the Secretary or Clerk is to indorse thereon the day on which such return shall be made or such message received, and make entry of the fact of such return, or the receipt of such message, in his Journal of the proceedings; and such return or sending of such message is to be deemed and taken to be a return of such bill to the House in which it originated, or a sending of such message to such House, to all intents and purposes.

The second section provides that every bill which having passed both Houses of Congress and having been presented to the President as provided in the Constitution, shall not have been returned by the President with his objections thereto to that House in which it originated within the time herein defined and declared, shall be a law; and it is declared to be the duty of the President in such case immediately to deliver such bill, so having become a law, to the Secretary of State, who is to receive and proceed with the same in the same manner as may be provided by law for bills signed by the President, and to certify thereon, and in the promulgation thereof, that such bill has become a law for the cause aforesaid.

It is provided in the third section that the time mentioned in this act shall be computed by excluding the day on which a bill may be presented to the President, and including the tenth day (Sundays excepted) thereafter.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I desire to submit an inquiry to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] This bill provides that bills disapproved by the President are to be returned when the two Houses are not in session to the Clerk of the House or the Secretary of the Senate. In the case of a vetoed bill returned in that way how would we act upon the bill in pursuance of the constitutional provision?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The bill when returned to the Clerk of the House or the Secretary of the Senate would be considered as returned to the House or the Senate.

Mr. KERR. I desire to inquire whether this bill originates here or in the Senate?

The SPEAKER. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. KERR. Then I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yield to allow that motion to be made?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I cannot yield for that purpose. Of course the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary would defeat it for this session.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether there is any necessity for passing the bill at this session. I do not see any reason why it may not wait until next session. It contains provisions which ought to be considered.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It depends of course upon our action at the present session whether the session shall be closed by an adjournment till the commencement of the session in December, or whether we are to take a recess as we did last year. If we take a recess the same difficulty which has arisen heretofore may arise again. I do not see how this bill can work any injury to anybody.

Mr. MILLER. What is to be gained by its passage?

Mr. BOUTWELL. According to the construction put upon his constitutional authority if this Congress took a recess for three days and the ten days expired in those three days, he would hold the bill and it would become inoperative.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I hope this will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MARSHALL. This involves perhaps a change of the Constitution. It is at least a most important measure, and ought to be considered by a committee of the House. The reading of the bill has not been heard by one third of the members. It is therefore utterly impossible they can understand it. It should be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed, believing there is time enough in which to act on it.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 286 to incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America.

Mr. WELKER. This bill has been considered and favorably acted on by the Committee for the District of Columbia. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. There is a misunderstanding or misrepresentation in this case. It has never been reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. WELKER. This identical bill was introduced and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. It was referred to a sub-committee. That committee examined it thoroughly, and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH] was directed to report it. The gentleman from New York was, perhaps, absent. The gentleman from Maryland never had the opportunity, and it was introduced into the Senate, and passed unanimously.

Mr. WOOD. I submit the gentleman is in error in stating that the principles now contained in this bill ever were decided upon by the Committee for the District of Columbia. I was present when this whole subject was discussed, and the committee failed to agree on these very principles.

Mr. WELKER. One of the objections raised in the committee is obviated by the amendment of the Senate, which requires these branch offices to exercise their duties under the laws of the States.

Mr. McCULLOUGH. I think the bill was introduced at the same time one was pending in the Senate. There were objections to the bill at the time in reference to these branch offices. My recollection is that I was directed to report it with a provision that the branch offices should be under the laws of the States.

Mr. WELKER. That is the Senate amendment. I demand the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 91.

So the bill was not laid upon the table.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I hope the bill will be referred.

Mr. WELKER. I would if it were not so near the close of the session.

Mr. KERR. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WOOD. I will give $5,000,000 for the grant this bill makes.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 50, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Bentley, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boyden, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Churchill, Reeder, W. Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Coville, Cullom, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eia, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Grady, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Langley, Heaton, Lieby, Hill, Hinds, Hulburd, Hunter, Jones, Jones, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelley, Ketchum, Keuntz, Ladin, Lash, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moore, head, Mullins, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Poland, Polsey, Raum, Scherck, Scofield, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, and Woodbridge—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Baker, Barnes, Beck, Boutwell, Brooks, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Dawes, Eliot, Farnsworth, Getz, Glossbrenner, Goldaday, Haight, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kerr, Knott, William Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Faine, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Ross, Sawyer, Sitgreaves, Stewart, Taber, Taylor, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Aiken, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—50.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Callis, Chandler, Cornell, Delano, Dowers, Dixon, Dodge, Eldridge, Finney, Fox, Grover, Harding, Hawkins, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Julian, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Loughridge, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Nunn, Phelps, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Smith, Stone, Sypher, Taffe, John Trimble, Trigholl, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Woodward—74.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER. The next business upon the Speaker's table is Senate joint resolution No. 137, to extend the time for the Northern Pacific railroad, a duplicate of which has already become a law.

Mr. KELSEY. I move to lay the joint resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND TITLES IN NEBRASKA.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 481, to confirm the titles to certain lands in the State of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that in all cases in which the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior has finally decided in favor of preemption settlers or locators of Indian or half-breed scrip, and issued patents to them for lands within the corporate limits of the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, the right and title of the patentee or patentees shall not be defeated or impaired because such land was within the said corporate limits, but if good in every other respect the title shall be good and valid, notwithstanding such lands may have been within the said corporate limits, and notwithstanding the entry thereof by any preëmptor or locator of Indian or half-breed scrip was forbidden by the tenth section of the act of September 4, 1841, because so within said limit.

Mr. TAFKE. I move to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That the following tracts of land to wit: the north half of the northeast quarter of section fifteen, the west half of the southeast quarter of section ten, the east half of the southeast quarter and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section nine, township fifteen, north of range thirteen of the sixtieth principal meridian, are hereby excepted from the operation of this act.

This bill is entirely local in its application. The object of it is to quiet titles. Some question seems to have arisen as to whether the lands outside of the three hundred and twenty acres permitted to be preempted by the city authorities under the act of 1841, and within the corporate limits, are preëemptible. The people of that city have held this land some twelve years under the accepted construction of the law, but for fear there might be a question this bill is proposed, and my amendment excepts certain lands where there is any controversy from the operation of the law.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know whether there is any litigation or any adverse claimant against any of this land.

Mr. TAFFE. There are none so far as I know. But I have excepted from the operation of this bill the tracts named in the amendment, so that if there should be any controversy my amendment will cover them.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It seems to me, from the gentleman's statement, that the bill is right.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. How much land is affected by this bill? We ought to know how much in order to vote intelligently.

Mr. TAFFE. I cannot tell precisely how much.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. About how much?

Mr. TAFFE. I really cannot tell with any degree of accuracy.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I suppose the lands have been paid for?

Mr. TAFFE. They were bought and paid for according to the usual course under the preëemption law. Some question has arisen as to whether the land was preëemptible or not. I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will let it go to the Committee on the Public Lands. It is a most strange and dangerous thing.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 68, noes 41.

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to inquire whether these lots thus distributed in Omaha are not worth as much as they are in Pittsburg or Cincinnati?

The main question was ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. TAFFE, it was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time—ayes 72, noes 38; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BROOKS. As this is an important measure, changing the land titles in a large and rising city, I feel it my duty to call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 118, nays 23, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Bingham, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Boyden, Broomall, Buokland, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick B. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullum, Dawes, Delano, Dewesse, Dockery, Donnelly, Briggs, Beckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Ferry, Fields, Garfield, Goss, Halsey, Hamilton, Langhoy, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hopkins, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Ingersoll, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kelsey, Ketcham, Koontz, Lufkin, Lash, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McCarthy, McClurg, McKee, Mercer, Miller, Moore, Moorhead, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Pierce, Pike, Pie, Plants, Poland, Polesie, Pomeroy, Randall, Raun, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Taffe, Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Eliza B. Washburne, Henry B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Walker, Wiltmore, William Williams, James P. Wilson, and Windom—113.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Beck, Brooks, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Glessner, Goldsby, Grover, Haight, Hotchkiss, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Marshall, McCullough, Nicholson, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, and Wood—23.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Boyer, Brownwell, Buckley, Burr, Cake, Chanler, Cornell, Dixon, Dodge, Eia, Finney, Fox, French, Gravely, Griswold, Harding, Hawkins, Hinds, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Julian, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Logan, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCormick, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsam, Niblack, Norris, Perham, Peters, Phelps, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Sypher, Taber, John Trimble, Twichell, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—80.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. TAFFE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT—MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 252) to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would ask that this bill be put upon its passage, and I will state to the House that it creates a new land district in a portion of my congressional district that is increasing with very great rapidity in population. The settlers are mainly settlers under the homestead law, and are generally poor men. As it is now they have to travel from fifty to one hundred miles to the nearest land office at St. Cloud, and the expense of that travel and taking their witnesses with them is a very heavy tax upon that population. This bill will remedy that state of things. It will cost the Government nothing, because the salaries of the land officers will be paid by the fees received from settlers. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

The bill was then read. The first section authorizes the President of the United States to establish an additional land district in the State of Minnesota embracing all that part of the present northwestern land district which lies north of township No. 124, northwest of range No. 35, west of the fifth principal meridian, and to fix from time to time the boundaries thereof, which district shall be named after the place at which the office shall first be established. The President is to have power to fix from time to time the location of the office for such district. The second section authorizes the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and receiver for the said land district, who shall be required to reside at the site of the land office, and also shall be subject to the same laws and receive the same compensation as other land officers in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. MAYNARD. This bill creates a new office, and I think it should come from the Committee on the Public Lands of this House. I hope the gentleman will not insist on its being pressed at this time.

Mr. DONNELLY. I would say that the Committee on the Public Lands have adjourned sine die for this session. If, therefore, the bill is referred to that committee it will inevitably go over until next session. In the mean time the state of facts will continue to which I have referred. I have no interest in the matter. In fact if I have any interest it would be against the passage of the bill, for the patronage created would not be friendly to myself. I feel, however, that my interests should be subordinated to the interests of my constituents, and that it is far better I should suffer than that the poor men who live in that region should longer endure the heavy outlays to which they have been subjected.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] has advocated the local interests of his constituents very handsomely, and has been very faithful to them. I trust now that for the considerations he has suggested this bill will go over to the next session. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. DONNELLY. The policy of the homestead law is based upon the theory of giving the poor man a homestead for ten dollars. Yet as the law is now, in my State he has to pay forty or fifty or even seventy-five dollars for a homestead, in traveling expenses for himself and witnesses to and from the place where the land office is situated. I am only pleading for the interest of the poor man.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DONNELLY. Certainly.

Mr. MULLINS. Did not these poor people know they were going so far away from the land office when they went there?

Mr. DONNELLY. I now call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The previous question, if sustained, will operate first upon the motion to refer, and will be exhausted upon the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands; and upon a division there were—ayes 58, noes 50.

Before the result was announced,

Mr. DONNELLY called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DONNELLY and Mr. MAYNARD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 47, noes 62.

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

The bill was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. DONNELLY. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was passed; there being upon a division—ayes seventy-eight, noes not counted.

Mr. DONNELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. WOODBRIDGE, on account of sickness in his family.

TEMPORARY LOAN CERTIFICATES.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 543, to provide for the further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes, be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

No objection was made.

The bill was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

COMMERCE ON THE LAKES.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. A Senate bill, in relation to the commerce on the northern and northwestern lakes, has been referred to the Committee of Commerce. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of Commerce be discharged from its further consideration, and that it take its place on the Speaker's table, where it may be reached this session.

Mr. SPALDING and Mr. ARNELL objected.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 492, to extend the time for the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad, in the State of California; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the bill.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, of the State of California, shall, instead of the times now fixed by law for the construction of the first section of its road and telegraph line, have until the 1st day of July, 1870, for the construction of the first thirty miles, and they shall be required to construct at least twenty miles every year thereafter, and the whole line of their road within the time now provided by law.

Mr. SCOFIELD. When does their time for constructing the first thirty miles expire under the present law?

Mr. HIGBY. According to my construction of the law it expires in July, 1869.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then there is plenty of time to consider this bill at the next session.

Mr. HIGBY. There is a difference in the construction of the law; I have only given what is my construction of it. This is to obviate any difficulty that may arise because of that difference of construction. We do not ask any extension of time for the completion of the road, or any increase of the grant; only an extension of the time for the completion of the first thirty miles. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HIGBY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TERRITORY OF WYOMING.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 357, to provide a territorial government for the Territory of Wyoming; which was taken from the table, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Territories; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the bill will be put upon its passage now.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Should the previous question be seconded and the motion to refer be voted down, will not the question then be upon the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has moved to refer the bill to the Committee on Territories, and demanded the previous question. If the previous question should be sustained, and the motion to refer voted down, the previous question will not exhaust itself till the third reading of the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the House will vote down the motion to refer, and pass the bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope the previous question will not be sustained.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the call for the previous question, and yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] the chairman of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. There are two or three amendments which I desire to offer to this bill.

The SPEAKER. A motion to amend cannot be made while a motion to refer is pending.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to say that the Committee on Territories have instructed me to move the reference of this bill to that committee for action next winter. With that statement I ask the previous question.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I desire to state that at the commencement of the present session, some eight months ago, this bill was referred to the Committee on Territories of this House. I, with other gentlemen, went before that committee; but we have never been able to get any action upon the bill. We were compelled to go to the Senate and get the bill introduced there. It was unanimously reported there by the Committee on Territories. It was discussed almost a whole day in the Senate, many of the Senators having recently visited that section of the country and seen this proposed Territory; and the bill was passed without a dissenting vote. It is now on the Speaker's table, and I hope it may be put on its passage.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to yield to allow an amendment to be reported.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I cannot yield now. If the bill should not be referred I have two or three amendments I desire to offer.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should be sustained there will be no opportunity for amendments, though the motion to refer should be voted down.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdrew the call for the previous question; but on the express condition that the gentleman from Ohio should renew it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Before calling the previous question I will answer any question which may be asked.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask my colleague why, in the name of common sense, this Territory is to be called Wyoming. What is the association or connection of that name with this particular district of country?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If there is to be any debate, I would like to ask why should this Territory be organized, imposing upon the Government a vast increase of expense?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will say to my colleague [Mr. SCHENCK] that I selected that name because it designated better than any other name which I could find the character of the Territory, Wyoming, meaning in the Indian language "large plains." I thought it better and more appropriate than Cheyenne, Shoshonee, or the name of any Indian tribe, mountain, or river within the limits of the Territory.

Mr. Speaker, when the Territory of Montana was organized, as chairman of the committee I blocked out the present Territory, gave it the name of Wyoming, and attached it to the Territory of Dakota. At that time I had never been through the Territory, and my judgment was that there was territorial area enough in that country to form another Territory sufficiently large to contain population enough for a State. In 1865 I traveled over the continent, and was in all the Territories except Arizona and New Mexico. From a personal examination I then came to the conclusion that we had more territorial organizations now than necessary, and that in this proposed Territory, which appears upon the map as large as all New England, there was not fertility enough in the soil to subsist a population sufficient for a single congressional district. Not one acre can be cultivated without irrigation, and not one acre in a thousand can be irrigated, because there is no water with which to irrigate even that proportion of its area.

Now, sir, we have too many territorial organizations to-day. These Territories are the nucleus of State organizations. After they are organized and have formed constitutions and been admitted as States they will remain as States for all time to come, even though their population decreased to a few thousand inhabitants. The State organization would be maintained for its political power and for the honors and emoluments of the position of Senators and members.

The State of Oregon was admitted to representation before I came into Congress, ten years ago. To-day it has not the population of my congressional district.

The State of Nevada has not half the population of my congressional district. If her mines should fail, which I hope may never be the case, the State would go into the sands as her rivers do. It will never have but one member. Its population will not increase fast enough to keep pace with the increased ratio which each apportionment of Representatives will require if the number of members should remain as now, at 2.33.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was a member of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, which admitted Oregon as a State. It was objected that she had not population equivalent to what was the ratio for a member at that time. The ratio of representation at that time was ninety thousand and odd. It was then stated by the then Delegate, who subsequently became Senator and a candidate for the Vice Presidency, that he most solemnly believed the population of Oregon was quite equal to the ratio.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I wish to correct the gentleman on that point. I also was a member when Oregon was admitted, and served in the same Congress with General Lane. I wish to do him justice. He said there were forty-five thousand people there and a fraction over. Oregon was admitted by a strict party vote. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts will bear me out.

Mr. DAWES. I was seeking the floor to make a statement of my recollection of the subject. My recollection is that General Lane stated that the population of Oregon was ninety thousand. I opposed the admission of Oregon, Mr. Speaker, as you know, and stated at the time the population was not fifty thousand.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. After I get through I will be ready to answer any question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. At the time of the admission of Oregon I was a member of this House, and I remember making a speech against it on the ground of paucity of population. It was then declared that it had ninety thousand population, and that was proved to the satisfaction of the House.

A MEMBER. That is to the Democrats.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The Legislature of the Territory of Idaho has sent memorials here for the organization of a territory out of the northern part of that Territory and a part of Montana and Washington. Citizens of New Mexico have memorialized Congress to give them a new Territory to be carved out of the southern part of that Territory, to be called Montezuma. There is not a Territory upon the continent in which you cannot find some of the population ready to detach themselves and organize a new Territory if Congress will but give them a territorial government and the offices and emoluments connected with it. The secret of the extraordinary lobbying and the offensive importunities to which members have been subjected during this winter has not been because the people were anxious for the organization of this new Territory. It has all been in the interest of paper-city proprietors and political "bummers," who desired the offices. But it is claimed that there is a large population in this part of Dakota without civil government. I have offered to transfer two of the judges from Dakota to that part of the Territory, but that would not suit the wants of the office applicants. The population of this Territory is vastly overestimated. From the vote of 1866 for the sitting Delegate, who ran against the regular Republican candidate, I should not think it was very large. He received 593 votes and his competitor 264 votes. It is proposed now to divide this Territory with a voting population of a few hundred men and make two Territories out of it, which will cost the Government at least $100,000 a year each. You will thus lay the foundation for two political communities with four Senators and but one Representative each, States which can never by any possibility have more than one member.

Sir, what will be the effect of this policy if we are to go on in this way; if a small population in any part of a Territory and a few speculators engaged in building paper cities ask for a territorial government and it is granted them? We have already eight organized Territories. We now have six States with but one member each. At the next census we are to have Rhode Island with but one. The admission of two or three Territories as States—and they are now knocking at the door—will give nine States with only nine Representatives, one each, while at the same time they will have eighteen Senators; and the number of small States will increase instead of diminish if this policy of organizing new Territories is to continue. When an election of President of the United States devolves on the House of Representatives one voter in Nevada with its present population represents sixty times the power of a voter in New York. I say nothing now of the inequality of political power which this policy is sure to perpetuate. It is violative of the democratic idea and the representative principle.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Did not the gentleman himself report the bills for these new States?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir. If the gentleman wants to know why I reported the bills for Nebraska, Colorado, and Nevada, I can state it; but it is not necessary for this discussion. I say, then, that the part of prudence and of wisdom is to postpone the consideration of this bill, as the Committee on the Territories, who have charge of it, understand it better than any Senators who last year went to Cheyenne, which is just within the eastern limits of this Territory. They have not examined this matter as carefully as I have; being a member of the committee for ten years, and having twice passed through this proposed Territory from east to west, I understand what I am talking about, and I say to this House that no greater folly could be perpetrated than to erect this Territory at this time. If done it will be in the interest of office applicants and the owners of cities on paper, and not in the interest of the people of the Territory, and it will be against the interests of the nation.

Mr. MAYNARD. Allow me to ask the gentleman at what time he ascertained his error and changed his territorial policy?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, I do not care to go into that discussion just now. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suggest that as the gentleman was in error then, perhaps he may be now.

Mr. SPALDING. I would like to have the gentleman answer me one or two questions.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. After the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have no time after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. SPALDING. How many square miles are there in the Territory?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Sir, it is almost as boundless as the desert of Sahara, and for the most part as worthless.

Mr. SPALDING. How far is Cheyenne from the seat of government of Dakota?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. About seven hundred miles.

The previous question was seconded—ayes 61, noes 49; and the main question ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. If the motion to refer does not prevail the question will then be on the passage of the bill, will it not?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. And if it does prevail then the question will not be on its passage? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It will not.

The question being put on referring the bill to the Committee on the Territories, there were—ayes 51, noes 71.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I demand the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes twenty-three; not one fifth of the members present.

Mr. ASHLEY. I demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. ASHLEY, of Ohio, and BINGHAM.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 105; the affirmative not being one fifth of the whole vote.

So the yeas and nays were refused, and the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Territories was disagreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 32, noes 95.

Mr. BINGHAM. I call the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 106, nays 50, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Ames, Archer, Arnett, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Banks, Beck, Benton, Bingham, Blair, Bowen, Boyden, Boyer, Brooks, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Culom, Dewesse, Dixon, Dockery, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eila, Eldridge, Ferry, Garfield, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Hamilton, Haughey, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Kerr, Koontz, Lash, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Mallory, Mann, Marshall, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Poland, Polsey, Pomeroy, Randall, Raum, Ross, Scofield, Shanks, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spalding, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stokes, Stone, Taft, Twichell, Upson, Van Auken, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodward—106.

NAYS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baker, Beatty, Boles, Boutwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Dawes, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, French, Griswold, Haight, Halsey, Hawkins, Hopkins, Hubbard, Hunter, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Ketcham, Ladin, William Lawrence, McCarthy, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Robertson, Sawyer, Schenck, Stewart, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, William Williams, and Windom—50.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Bromwell, Burr, Benjamin F. Butler, Calk, Chanler, Cornell, Delano, Dodge, Finney, Fox, Gravelly, Harding, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marvin, McClurg, McCormick, Morrill, Morrissey, Munger, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Koots, Selye, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, Sypher, Taylor, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Whittemore, Thomas Williams, John T. Wilson, and Woodward—60.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call, Mr. TABER stated that Mr. VAN TRUMP was confined to his room by sickness.

The result having been announced as above, Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867, agreed to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had ordered that Mr. SUMNER, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. DOOLITTLE be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws, agreed to the conference asked on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had ordered that Mr. RAMSEY, Mr. HARLAN, and Mr. MCCREERY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. R. No. 170) in relation to the library of the Department of Agriculture, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a vast amount of business yet on the Speaker's table, and I propose that we have a meeting at half past seven o'clock this evening. [Cries of "Agreed," and "No, no."]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will say, if the gentleman from Ohio will permit me, that I am willing that we shall go to business on the Speaker's table to-morrow at one o'clock. [Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. SCHENCK. We cannot get through business.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh, yes; we can. The Senate have adopted no resolution to adjourn. We may be kept here ten days.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he move to adjourn till ten o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent. [Cries of "Object."]

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent that we may go to business on the Speaker's table to-morrow after the election case is disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. I shall be perfectly satisfied with whatever the House may determine, but I prefer that my motion should be put for a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out "half past seven o'clock this evening," and inserting "half past ten o'clock to-morrow morning."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Oh, no; the committee have to meet in the morning.

Mr. GARFIELD. We can do more work in the morning than we can do in the evening.

The question was taken on Mr. GARFIELD's amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. SCHENCK's motion; and it being put, the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now ask unanimous consent that the House shall proceed to the business on the Speaker's table to-morrow after the Missouri and Utah contested-election cases shall have been disposed of.

Several MEMBERS. Only the Missouri case.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Very well, then, until after the Missouri contested-election case is disposed of.

Mr. DAWES. I object, unless the Utah case can be disposed of. It will be very brief. I do not propose to occupy two minutes' time myself. The contestant, I understand, desires to occupy an hour. It is due to the committee that the case should be disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] will be entitled to the floor for one hour on his own case.

Mr. PILE. I will state for the information of the House that I shall not detain them more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then that will be all right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there is no objection to the order that the House shall proceed to the business on the Speaker's table after the Missouri and Utah contested-election cases are disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY July 23, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, transmitting to the Senate in compliance with its resolution of the 9th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, communicating a copy of a paper received by him purporting to be a resolution of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Alabama, ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States known as article fourteen; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

LANDS IN NEBRASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska. The amendment was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the following tracts of land, to wit: the north half of the northwest quarter of section fifteen, the west half of the southwest quarter of section ten, the east half of the southwest quarter and the northwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section nine, township fifteen north of range thirteen east of the sixth principal meridian, are hereby excepted from the operation of this act.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a petition of officers of the Army, asking increased compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FOWLER presented the petition of Martha A. Sommerville, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia, praying that pensions be granted to the surviving soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and to the widows of such as have died; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of East Tennessee, praying legislation in favor of those interested in the exportation of distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the petition of Emilie Rossmasser, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was recommitted the motion submitted by Mr. DAVIS on the 1st instant, to print the report of the Secretary of War, communicating information relative to the purchase and sale of vessels by the War Department during the war of the rebellion, reported in favor of the motion; and it was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1118) to confirm to J. M. Hutchings and J. C. Lamon, their preemption claims in the Yosemite valley, in the State of California, have instructed me to make an adverse report, and to move the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be voted on immediately.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If there be no objection I ask to have the bill considered at this time, though perhaps some persons may desire to read the report before action is taken upon it.

Mr. COLE. I think there is no necessity for action now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; I will call it up before the session adjourns. I move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of W. A. Griffin, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 643) for the relief of W. A. Griffin. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

COAST DEFENSE.

Mr. HOWARD, from the joint Committee on Ordnance, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 171) in relation to coast defense; which was read twice.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that the joint resolution be acted on now.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the General of the Army and the Admiral of the Navy to inquire into the utility and practicability of the Ryan-Hitchcock mode of marine fortification, and to report to Congress at the next session.

Mr. CONNESS. There is only one objection that I see to the form of the resolution, that the Admiral is absent and likely to remain absent for some time. If the Senator would amend it so as to say "or, in the absence of the Admiral, the vice admiral," it would be practicable.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that amendment. The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

REWARD FOR JEFFERSON DAVIS'S CAPTORS.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis, have directed me to report the bill back with amendments, and recommend its passage. It interests a good many who were soldiers in the Army, and I believe there will be no sort of objection in the Senate to its passage. As it has to go back to the House of Representatives for concurrence in our amendments, I should be glad if the Senate would consider it at the present time.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HOWE. I suppose by unanimous consent the reading of the long list of names which the bill contains may be dispensed with. ["Certainly."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the names may be dispensed with if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection. The amendments reported by the Committee on Claims will be read.

The first amendment was to strike out in lines six, seven, and eight, of section one, the words "To James H. Wilson, of the State of Illinois, late major general of volunteers, $3,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to allow $4,000 to B. D. Pritchard, late lieutenant colonel of the fourth Michigan cavalry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line twelve to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to allow $4,000 to H. Harnden, late lieutenant colonel of the first Wisconsin cavalry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line fourteen to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to allow $4,000 to Joseph A. O. Yeoman, late captain of the first Ohio cavalry.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. POMEROY. I desire to make only one remark. It cost us more to catch that great criminal than we took for bail after we got him.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the time, and passed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Claims, being already on three committees. The request was granted.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to say that I would not have consented to part with the Senator from Vermont from the Committee on Claims if I could have helped myself, but I found I could not, and so I did not make any opposition.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WILSON. I move that leave of absence be granted to Mr. ROBERTSON, of South Carolina, for the remainder of the present session. The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 639) providing for a more efficient provisional government for Mississippi; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. THAYER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 640) to provide for the payment of subsistence furnished for the Navajo Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 641) in addition to the several acts providing for suppressing insurrections against the governments of States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LUX'S CASE.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to the Senate the facts relative to the trial of Albert M. D. C. Lux by a military commission at New Orleans, for the murder of a colored boy, together with a copy of the record in the case.

DUPLICATE BONDS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, upon satisfactory proof of the destruction of any of the bonds of the United States in the hands of bona fide holders, to issue to such holders a new bond or bonds of like kind and denomination.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (H. R. No. 1073) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1869.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1376) for the relief of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to ask the Senate to set aside two or three hours for the consideration of bills from that committee. I hope the Senate will grant me part of this evening, or to-morrow evening if this evening is engaged otherwise, for the purpose of considering pension bills. It is somewhat important for that committee to get its business out of the way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to the consideration of that matter at this time. I desire to call up House bill No. 1206.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I presume the motion is in order.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. We have more than a hundred pension bills to dispose of, and I cannot scramble for the floor to get up each one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves that at five o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess till half past seven for the purpose of considering pension bills at the evening session.

The motion was agreed to.

AMERICAN STEAMSHIP LINE TO EUROPE.

Mr. POMEROY. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall not proceed with that bill at this moment. Further on in the day I shall be ready to proceed with it. I have in progress of preparation some amendments that I intend to propose to it, which I have reason to believe will be acceptable, and as soon as I can spare a few minutes from the Senate Chamber it is my intention to go on with their preparation, and then I shall be as anxious to proceed with the consideration of the bill as the Senator from Kansas. But at present, before they are fully prepared, I prefer that the Senate shall not go on with its consideration. I will say that my object is to perfect the bill, not to delay it.

Mr. POMEROY. I did not know that the Senator anticipated making any amendments; but the session is so nearly through, and it is so difficult to get up bills for the purpose of passing them, that my own opinion is that we must consider this bill this morning or we shall not be able to consider it at all. I feel only the interest that all the friends of the measure feel; but I should like to have the Senate act upon it now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think at this late period of the session a bill ought not to be put off merely because a Senator is not ready.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well, sir, let it go on. I am glad to find the Senator from Maine in favor of some bill of this kind.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports. The question pending being on the amendment of Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, to strike out in section two after the word "steamships," in line five, the words "five of;" and in line six to strike out "and two others of not less than two thousand tons each;" so as to make the clause read:

At least seven first-class sea-going steamships which shall not be of less than three thousand tons each, Government measurement.

Mr. POMEROY. I believe the Senator from Vermont does not desire to press that amendment, but proposes to withdraw it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. After conference with my friend from Kansas, I am willing to withdraw that amendment upon his assenting to another amendment in relation to the average rate of speed. I understand that he will assent to it, and therefore I withdraw this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Iowa has an amendment that I believe he intends to move.

Mr. HARLAN. An amendment has been handed to me to be presented.

Mr. POMEROY. I have not seen the amendment, but I have been told it was to be offered.

Mr. HARLAN. I will offer it. It is to insert at the end of the third section:

And it is provided, That should the receipts under any contract made in pursuance of this act exceed the average of $800,000 yearly for the period of the above-named twenty years, then such excess shall be and belong to the Post Office Department, it being the intent and meaning of this act that the amount the said company shall receive during the period of the above-named twenty years for the postal service shall not exceed the sum of $800,000 yearly.

I desire to say in relation to the amendment that it states distinctly what the parties themselves want; but it has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I observe that the amendment says "twenty years." The time named in the bill was changed to ten years.

Mr. HARLAN. Then this ought to be changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me that $800,000 is very much too large an amount of subsidy. That for ten years would be $8,000,000. By the reading of the bill I think no one would infer that the amount of postages to be received by the company should ever be beyond $400,000 a year. I had no idea that they were to exceed $400,000, and I think no member of the committee had.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think there is a very exaggerated impression as to the amount of these postages. If this corporation were to receive $800,000 per annum they would have to do all the postal service between the United States and those ports to which it is proposed they shall carry the mails. To do that they would have to have thirty vessels in constant service, and I am sure that sum would not be too much compensation for that service. I am sure it would not be considered so by those who have any pride in seeing steamers crossing the ocean carrying the American flag. In order to receive all the postages they must carry all the mails. It is only proposed that this line shall carry about a mail a week in the first instance, and the receipts for that would not be more than about two thousand five hundred dollars for the outward trip, and they would not get probably over one hundred and twenty or one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars a year. That is all they are likely to get. To get six, seven, or eight hundred thousand dollars they must be prepared to carry all the mails that we send by way either of Queenstown or Southampton. Probably by any arrangement they can make within five years they will not be able to earn one fourth, certainly not one half of the amount of limit proposed.

The total cost of the trans-Atlantic mail service employed by the United States Post Office Department during the fiscal year which ended June 30, 1867, was $551,338 01. Fifty-two round trips between New York and Liverpool, via Queenstown, (at sea postage,) cost $241,381 93.

Twenty-four and one half round trips between New York and Bremen, via Southampton, (at sea postage) cost $91,331 33. Thirteen and one half round trips between New York and Hamburg, via Southampton, (at sea postage) cost $47,577 62. Thirty-eight round trips between New York and Havre, via Falmouth (at United States inland and sea postage) cost $73,059 92. The amounts paid from 30th June, 1867, to January 1, 1868, were as follows:

Twenty-seven round trips between New York and Liverpool, via Queenstown, (at sea postage,) $104,502 20. Twenty-seven round trips between New York and Bremen, via Southampton, (at sea postage) $77,171 14. Eleven round trips between New York and Hamburg, via Southampton, (at sea postage) $32,111 23. Total for six months, $213,784 57, (sixty-five round trips.)

There has been paid under the new arrangements, since January 1, 1868, at the rate of fifteen cents per ounce for letters, and six cents a pound for printed matter, from January 1 to March 31, 1868:

To Cunard line, fourteen outward trips.....	$21,026 42
To Inman line, thirteen outward trips.....	17,844 73
To Bremen line, fourteen outward trips.....	19,787 60
To Hamburg line, six outward trips.....	11,412 55

Total for three months.....	$70,071 30
Via Queenstown, twenty-seven outward trips.....	38,871 15
Via Southampton, twenty outward trips.....	31,200 15

These figures show that in no event during the time this contract would run, would this company be likely to receive four or five hundred thousand dollars a year, if they were to carry all the mails.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to repeat that this amendment offered by me has not been proposed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I am not sure that the amount named in it is not greater than is necessary. I desire the sense of the Senate on that subject. It may be observed, however, that they will not receive this sum of money unless it comes in from the postages on the mail matter carried by the parties themselves, both the land and sea postages on the matter carried by this company. It has been suggested to me, however, that a maximum of $600,000 extending over the whole period of ten years, probably would be sufficient, and for the purpose of testing the judgment of the Senate on that subject, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "eight," and inserting "six."

Mr. POMEROY. I think that is right.

Mr. HARLAN. I modify the amendment in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is so modified.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$600,000," and inserting "$400,000."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my friend that I do not understand that there is to be an average that one year is to make up for another. My understanding of it was that if the yearly pay in any one year came up to $600,000 the excess over that should go into the Treasury, not that the company should go back and make an average so as to secure the $600,000 in each year. That is not the idea of the contract as I understand it.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the amendment is drawn so as to enable them to receive the excess in one year sufficient to make up the deficiency for preceding years.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was not my understanding of the amendment that was to be made. I supposed they were to take the risk.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Under the Cunard contract, until within the past year, the amount paid by the British Government was £180,000 for all the service of the Cunard line, or about equal to the sum proposed at first by the Senator from Iowa. But under the contract for the last year the British Government paid the Cunard line £90,000 for all their service. Now, it does seem to me, that if, for the amount of service stipulated for here in this bill, we pay $400,000 a year, we are paying a very liberal price for the service. If it should be conditioned as proposed by this amendment, and the Postmaster General should be in favor of patronizing this line, and he should direct the mails at the western cities to be made up on such days as would reach these steamships and no others, this steamship company would be at once placed in a position to receive a very large amount of postages.

If we are to make a monopoly of steamships centering at but one port, shipping by Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, Portland, and yielding the entire business to the city of New York, it does seem to me that we ought to have at least the service performed for $400,000 a year. I trust the Senate will not vote for any larger sum than that. Then the point to which the attention of the Senate was called by the Senator from Maine is certainly an important one. They ought not in this long course of years to make up the average sum that they are to receive so as to make up for any deficiencies in the first part of the service when they perform a very small amount of service by the receipts toward the end of the contract, when they have increased their number of ships. I trust that portion of the amendment will be modified or amended by the Senate before it passes.

Mr. CORBETT. I propose to offer an amendment to meet the point suggested when it shall be in order to do so. The third section now provides:

That when the receipts of said navigation company for sea postages under any contract to be made in pursuance of this act shall equal or exceed the sum of $400,000 per annum, then the right of said company to receive the inland postages shall cease and determine, and said company shall only receive the sea postages.

There I propose to insert:

Provided, Said postages shall not exceed at any time $600,000.

So that if in the last few years the sea postages reach $600,000, the company may have that sum, but shall not make an average. By my amendment if the whole postages exceed $400,000, the inland postage is to be cut off, and if it then amounts to over $400,000 for the remainder of the time it shall not at any time exceed $600,000. It seems to me that this will obviate the objections of the Senator from Vermont, and the company may during the last few years receive between four and six hundred thousand dollars. If the Senator from Vermont will withdraw his amendment I will propose this.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The amendment pending is offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NYE. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Vermont and the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will not prevail. The honorable Senator from Vermont seems to be under the apprehension that we are going to have a steamship monopoly. I wish, for the honor of this country, we could say that we had one. A monopoly, Mr. President, exists now; our whole transit trade and our mails are monopolized by British ships. That is where the monopoly lies; and how have they obtained that monopoly? Not by the postages to which the honorable Senator refers, but in the first place by large subsidies, till their ships number enough almost in length to make a raft across the Atlantic ocean. By the subsidies of that nation and by the mail privileges which they have, they have become enabled to make a monopoly of the carrying trade of the sea. Sir, to break up that monopoly this effort is made to establish this line; and with what? With no subsidy, with nothing but the simple earnings of the line; and when it is proposed that the trans-Atlantic mails of the United States shall pay for carrying themselves, the honorable Senator from Vermont sees a monopoly in it.

Sir, we are now paying hundreds of thousands of dollars a year for carrying the mails to British capitalists and British ship-owners, and now when we come here and ask to establish a line of our own ships under our own flag, the honorable Senator is afraid of a monopoly! Sir, I take it this Government would be willing to make such a contract to-day generally, and by it we could save millions. If all the mails of the United States, internal and external, could be carried for the postages, I repeat the Government would save millions. Now, with our waning commerce as it is, when this attempt is made by simply paying the postages upon the letters and packages they carry to establish an American line, I wonder that we meet objection here from as wise men as the honorable Senator from Vermont. If the postage earned shall amount to $600,000 let them have it. I wish there was something done to drive every British ship from our shores that carries our mails and takes our money from us. We have the amount of postage receipts from the honorable chairman of the Post Office Committee, and it shows that there is no probability that in ten years they will reach the maximum here fixed; but if they do let the sum go to this line, and it will add to the character, the dignity, and the importance of this nation, for the more they get the better ships they can build.

The honorable Senator from Vermont is almost always right in figures; and whenever I differ from him in regard to figures I think I am wrong till I look at the papers. The other day we insisted upon it that these vessels should be three thousand tons, nothing less. Now, sir, there is but one vessel in the whole number engaged in carrying the American mails in British ships that amounts to three thousand tons—only one. Some of them are as low as two thousand, twenty-three hundred, twenty-four hundred, twenty-five hundred, twenty-six hundred tons; so they range along. My honorable friend is willing that the mails should be carried on British ships of inferior size; but so apprehensive seems he to be that our flag shall again regain its influence upon the sea and our seamanship be exhibited that he wants even larger ships to start with than the British have.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I withdraw my amendment, and accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HARLAN. I withdraw mine.

Mr. POMEROY. I think the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be entirely satisfactory. That is if the postages ever come up in any one year to $600,000 they get that sum, and there is no average about it.

Mr. CORBETT. I move to amend the bill by adding to the third section:

And provided further. That such postages shall not exceed $600,000 per annum after the discontinuance of said inland postages.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose, by common consent, all the places in the bill where the word "twenty" occurs will be stricken out, and the word "ten" inserted before "years," agreeably to the previous vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be done to make the bill conform to the action already had.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I should like to strike out some of the nonsense in the bill. In the fifth section it provides that they "shall mount an armament, if required, of two guns each;" all these vessels always have two guns to fire salutes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will not do any harm.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is no sort of consequence. I think the whole section might as well be stricken out. It provides also for "one apprentice to be instructed in engineering and seamanship."

Mr. POMEROY. The Senator from Vermont had a bill the other day which said that it should not be a precedent for other bills. I objected to that clause and wanted it stricken out; but he would not have it stricken out.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to insert this proviso at the end of the second section:

And provided. That the average rate of speed of the steamships of the said Navigation Company shall not be less than that of the steamships of other lines upon the same or similar routes; and if for the space of three months the trips successively of the steamships of said company shall be made in longer time than that employed by other steamships as aforesaid, then any contract made under the provisions of this act shall cease and determine at the pleasure of the Government of the United States.

I take it there is no objection to that.

Mr. POMEROY. The only objection I have to it is that it looks as if we were advertising to all nations that we are going to have a race across the ocean with them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Not at all.

Mr. POMEROY. I say it has that look.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If I understand the amendment, it seems to me it is very objectionable. The suggestion made by the Senator from Kansas that it is encouraging racing across the ocean is a good objection. The whole subject will be under the control of the Department as the bill stands.

Mr. POMEROY. In the western waters some years ago when boats undertook to go very fast and race with each other a great many blew up.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If we are to have a large contract of this kind we do not want to make it without the power to terminate it provided the other party does not perform it according to its stipulations. All that is stipulated here is that they shall average the rate of speed of other vessels engaged upon similar routes, and if for the space of three months they fail to do that, we can then terminate the contract without paying damages. That is all the proposition is. Is it to be supposed that if we have steamers that are at all equal to those of other companies, they can fail for twelve successive voyages, that is for three months, once each week? The thing is absurd; but unless there is a provision of this kind they may go on and perform the service in fourteen or fifteen days, and yet the Government have no power to terminate the contract.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I ask if it is not equally absurd to suppose that an American line of steamers will run in less time than a foreign line?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. They do. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning-hour having expired, the Chair must call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. NYE. I hope we shall a vote on this bill.

Mr. POMEROY. Let the unfinished business be laid aside for a few minutes.

Mr. CONNESS. I apprehend there is no chance of getting this bill through in a few minutes. If Senators are going to oppose such a provision as that which has been offered by the Senator from Vermont to this bill it is time to discuss it.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall make no further remarks on the subject.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to be heard on this proposition. That an average amount of speed such as is made by other lines shall not be secured on this line seems to me very absurd.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday may be passed over if there be no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. Let it go over for a little while.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection; and the unfinished business will be passed over, and the consideration of House bill No. 939 continued. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I had supposed that this was fairly agreed upon. I withdrew my other amendment on that understanding. I so understood it in conference with the Senator from Kansas. Now, if there be an opposition raised here to this provision, which is manifestly proper, I shall feel at liberty to propose any amendments.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there opposition to it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I understand that there is.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to understand from the Senator from Kansas whether there is any objection to this amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. I shall make no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand there is no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

NATIONAL CAPITAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill which merely adds a single word to an act heretofore passed, by way of correction. I hope it will be considered now.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not. I hope we shall go on with the unfinished business. It has been postponed for a week for almost everything.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand this is a mere formal matter which can take but a moment. It is to change a single word in a bill.

Mr. CONNESS. A bill already passed?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir. It is merely to correct a verbal mistake.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. It is merely to add one word to a bill already passed.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 642) to amend the charter of the National Capital Life Insurance Company was read three times, and passed. It proposes to change the title of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Capital Insurance Company," approved March 2, 1867, to "An act to incorporate the National Capital Life Insurance Company."

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. CORBETT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I desire to state upon that motion, that there are a large number of nominations to some very important offices, revenue offices and others, that must be confirmed. Many of them will be rejected, and will have to go back to the President so that others may be appointed in their places. I think we ought to dispose of those matters.

Mr. CONNESS. I call the Senator to order. Discussion is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The motion to go into executive session is not debatable under the rules.

Mr. CORBETT. We ought to have an executive session for an hour or so.

Mr. CONNESS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays; and I ask the Senate not to adopt it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Ferry, Hendricks, McCreery, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Sumner, Tipton, Vickers, and Welch—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Drake, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Rice, Stewart, Thayer, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cattell, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Kellogg, Norton, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Sherman, Trumbull, Whyte, and Wilson—21.

So the motion was not agreed to.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens in foreign States. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.]

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the reading of the two amendments and of the third section of the bill as it stands. As I understand it at this time the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] was adopted in lieu of the third section, and now the question is on substituting the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section, as amended, will be read, and also the amendment proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment proposed is to strike out the third section of the bill, as amended, which is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen; and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the President to Congress.

It is also proposed to add to the second section of the bill—

Mr. BUCKALEW. My amendment is to strike out the whole of that, and then to add what the Clerk will read to the second section.

Mr. CONNESS. I suppose that amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania is not in order until after the vote is taken on striking out the third section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words can, however, be read for information. The first question is on striking out the third section, and then it will be in order to amend the second section in the manner proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to have that amendment read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to insert at the end of the second section:

And it shall be the duty of the President to exert all his powers under the Constitution and laws of the United States, for the protection and relief of citizens of the United States abroad, and to report promptly to Congress, from time to time, all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizens by the Government of any foreign country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to strike out the third section of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BUCKALEW. At the request of certain gentlemen who desire to vote for this amendment of mine, I will change the form of my motion. I move to strike out all of the third section as it now stands after the word "that," and insert in lieu of the words stricken out:

It shall be the duty of the President to exert all his powers under the Constitution and laws for the protection and relief of citizens of the United States abroad, and to report promptly to Congress from time to time all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizens by the Government of any foreign country.

Mr. HOWARD. I understand the motion to be to strike out the third section entirely and substitute the words which have just been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Corbett, Davis, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Hendricks, McCreery, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Robertson, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, Welch, and Willey—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Cragin, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Kellogg, Norton, Osborn, Pool, Ross, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Wade, and Whyte—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask that section as amended be now read, that we may see how it stands.

The Chief Clerk read the section, as amended, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President to exert all his powers under the Constitution and laws for the protection and relief of citizens of the United States abroad, and to report promptly to Congress, from time to time, all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizens by the Government of any foreign country.

Mr. HOWARD. Is that all there is of it?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir; there is all there is of it. The Senate has voted to strike out what little vitality there was in the bill. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words in regard to this bill. I have no further interest in what shall be done with it. The insertion of the clause proposed, I regard and say and declare to be an insult to every naturalized citizen in the United States; it is cruel to those who are in prison; and in my opinion it will be met as it ought to be met—by the opposition of men who feel deeply and have a right to feel deeply upon this question.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President I am not satisfied with the clause as it stands now; and I move this amendment be added to it:

And whenever any citizen shall be or shall have been unlawfully arrested or unlawfully detained by any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President on receiving information thereof to demand the release and liberation of such citizen; and in case of the refusal or unreasonable delay of such foreign Government to release such citizen, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to communicate the facts of the case to Congress at the earliest practicable moment, with such recommendations as he may think fit; and he may in the meantime withdraw the representative of the United States from such foreign Government, and shall refuse to hold further diplomatic correspondence with any such representative of foreign Government until justice shall be done in the matter by such foreign Government.

I am not perfectly satisfied to leave this matter in such an indefinite form as this section now stands. Cases may occur where it would be becoming the dignity of the Government of our country to make a peremptory demand upon a foreign Government by which the liberty of our citizens abroad, whether native or naturalized, may be restrained. Such things are of frequent occurrence in the intercourse of nations, and I would authorize the President in such a case, where he finds it necessary, to make a demand for the liberation of an American citizen, and where such demand is refused to discontinue diplomatic intercourse with that Government until the latter should do justice in the premises; and if the United States find it necessary to make a demand of that description, it is certainly becoming us, as a Government and as a people, to make that demand good in some form. I would not, on such an occasion, go to war immediately. I would take the preliminary steps, however, to show such offending Government that we are in earnest and that our demand is not to pass unheeded.

Our Government will never, I fancy, make any unreasonable or rash or precipitate demand of this kind; but should an occasion arise when the dignity of the nation requires it, I am in favor of making the demand good, and teaching the offending foreign Government that it must act according to the laws of nations, and respect our wishes. I care not what the Government may be, whether it be that of Great Britain or France or North Germany or any other Government under heaven. The rights of American citizens abroad should be respected; and it is the highest office of every Government to see to it that its citizens or subjects receive due protection against oppression on the part of other nations. I hope, therefore, that this amendment of mine will be adopted.

Mr. STEWART. I hope so, too. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as adopted, amounts simply to this: that the President may negotiate and he may report to Congress. He has power to do that now. It does not declare any specific remedy. The President in his last annual message suggested to Congress to extend to him some power. We claim that he is controlled by legislation. He has asked for some power to act in the premises, he not conceiving himself as having under the laws as they are any ability to do anything. This section now certainly does not confer on him any specific authority to take any action. I wish to call attention of the Senate to that point.

It is often said that it is a cause of war for us to arrest a British subject. Sir, we should be at war all the while if we had spirit enough to resist such acts on the part of Great Britain. They have our citizens incarcerated. If it would be a cause of war on their part for us to arrest their subjects is not their arrest and detention of our citizens a sufficient provocation for us to empower the President to suspend diplomatic relations? He can simply investigate, correspond, and report to Congress; that is all there is of it. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment of the Senator from Michigan and not abandon the whole thing. It seems to me it is a shame to abandon our citizens abroad.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate for a few minutes upon this measure, to state the reasons for the vote I shall give, because that vote is contrary to the one which I was disposed to give when the bill was first suggested to the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts, who opened this debate, [Mr. SUMNER,] quotes the law of nations and cites his great learning as to those laws for argument against the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. Everybody knows the bill is nothing without the House provision. The Senator abandons the doctrine of retaliation, and counsels as much of the country, in the very face of the fact that during the civil war we placed in close confinement rebel officers to restrain rebellion and ill treatment of our colored soldiers in the hands of the rebels. Did the Senator protest then? I did not hear it. He also abandons the doctrine of reprisals in face of the fact that this is a people whose policy in peace is to disband armies and lay up navies. We thus are in no condition to aggress on the rights of others, and by abandoning reprisals we are defenseless in resisting aggressions from other nations. Shall we abandon the sure defense we have in our merchant marine and fold our arms and see every sail driven from the ocean? We must wait the slow conclusions of regularity and order; we must fight by rule; we must first build a navy, and before we have completed it find ourselves as the Alabama found us. No humiliation to our country has equaled the Alabama question. In war retaliation becomes at times a measure of the utmost humanity, and the issuing of letters of marque for reprisals has averted one war with France, and the fear of them have kept off the strong arm of jealous nations throughout our history as a nation. The Senator counsels us to abandon this our strongest arm and come in our defenseless condition to resist the attack of well armed, hostile forces; or, for the sake of regularity of proceedings, he would burden the people with a great debt and great taxation to maintain large standing armies and navies.

Prior to the civil war we could have armed our merchant service with letters and have banished British commerce from the ocean in a short period. When the emergency came what did we do? We lay upon our back, refused, from a spirit akin to that which animates the Senator, to make the only defensive arm we had available, and saw, one after another, every armed vessel driven from the sea, and British shipping in their place. This was a great blunder; yes, a great crime. Our remedy gone, in deep humiliation we watched for the conclusion of the war to wipe out the disgrace.

We could at one time have placed cannon on every merchant vessel and swords in the hands of our gallant tars, who would have applied the simple law of self-preservation and have saved us. We closed the war, and now wait for measures that will in some degree satisfy our wounded honor. And we have treaties sent here and reasons adduced that enable a foreign Power to regulate for us our own citizenship. What deeper humiliation than, first, to permit the destruction of our property, then the regulating of the political status of our citizens?

No grander spectacle has been presented in the history of nations than the recent act of Britain, when she extended her strong arm in a remote quarter of the globe, in an unknown country, with an uneven chance of success, and at great expense, to protect and cover from the hands of a presumptuous Power a few simple British subjects.

We have taken from Englishmen much of our law and love for liberty. We acknowledge our obligation. But, sir, this example which she has set us in protecting the liberties of British subjects from the aggressions of foreign Powers is deserving of greater praise offering than her whole past glorious contests for constitutional law and liberty of the citizen. Under the lead of the Senator from Massachusetts we cannot refuse to follow her glorious example. God forbid!

The question has never been presented to us as it is now presented. We have been remiss. We have neglected our duty to ourselves and to those we invite to our shores. We have permitted the little and the great to trample under their feet our laws, and bid us defiance time out of mind. When returned citizens of the United States have been imprisoned and punished for being such we remonstrate; our ministers have remonstrated. These remonstrances, though constantly repeated, have availed nothing. We come to-day and accept the German version as to who is an American citizen. How long would Great Britain permit any Power to contravene her laws? An American soldier, born in Germany, raised to high rank it may be, and in one year's service becomes an American citizen, visits the land of his birth and is arrested and compelled to work out and suffer penalties that were attached to a citizenship a portion of which perhaps was while battling for our institutions. We were weak when we declared war against Great Britain for violating the deck of American ships in search of men deserting from theirs or men subjects of hers. Did we ever abandon the doctrine that the flag covers and protects the deck and all thereon, as well as it covers and protects the land and inhabitants throughout its jurisdiction? Certainly not; and we have held that even a slave taken voluntarily by its owner into a free State became thenceforth a freeman. This even in the face of the all-powerful negro aristocracy of the South who then controlled our Government. Shall we not accord to a free white Englishman or Scotchman or Irishman or German as much? Did these Powers not permit and encourage their inhabitants to leave their jurisdiction? Why should they when they return require service from them? Shame, sir, that we must consent to give less to such citizens when we have given it to the black men of the South; and shame, double shame, on those Powers who make terms and qualifications toward those they have abandoned; but far deeper shame on us for admitting any Power to regulate our citizenship. Can a man hold any divided allegiance? Under our law, no.

Under our treaties for four years he may exercise the privileges of a citizen of the United States, and at the same time be a subject of a foreign Power. A Power that voluntarily permits its citizens to leave its jurisdiction, consents to the jurisdiction of another Power, and cannot compel his return from the second Power, and when such person consents to the abandonment of the one by the assumption of the other he may return to the first-named Power freed from all former political disabilities. Though there may be among them men owing military service, the last Power that assumes final jurisdiction can never be required to make such a discrimination, for it is manifestly absurd to ask one nation to aid in the arrest of a deserter, or in the aid of restrictive acts touching such person, for this would be asking one nation to aid another in the execution of its laws. If a nation effects to prevent its citizens from leaving its jurisdiction, failing, it has no remedy as a Power too weak to enforce its acts, may not call on another for help, nor is such power entitled to hold as a subject those it has no power over. If this is not international law it is the law that this people will stand by. It is the law of progress and of necessity. It is the law of electricity and of steam. No international law has yet been written touching these new forces.

Can you stop the people of Europe from coming to the rich inheritance here? We desire it. These interests make the demand. Can you consent that any restraint can be put on one class of American citizens and withheld from another by a foreign Government? Certainly not. It is a contradiction. It is not practical. You may make treaties withdrawing your rights and privileges of citizens which our law has conferred toward those who leave the country. It will avail nothing. It will stand as long as the law which disfranchises deserters stands; until it comes before the courts. They say you must first convict of crime; desertion is no crime in times of peace. Stamp a man with the full insignia of an American citizen, and your honor, your plighted faith, your best interest, demands that no former political obligation shall detract from full allegiance to his new country.

I would in defense of this principle urge, first, retaliation; then reprisals; then war. For all of which we have illustrious and beneficial precedents in both English and American history. I would hold up to public condemnation him who would introduce any qualification touching a public law, least of all one touching the right of an American citizen to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. A Government does not deserve to exist, it is not fit to be, that disregards the principle.

As to the policy of the easy introduction of foreigners to our citizenship I have nothing to say; I perhaps should oppose it. As to the Irish, who are more subjects of church and priests than they are interested by the principles of a republic, I might exclude them entirely. But the law stands, nevertheless, without discrimination or qualification, and I will not sit idly by and witness a violation of our law, such violation being enforced by hostile acts of a foreign Power. Repeal your law or enforce it. None of the precedents quoted by the honorable Senator stand a moment in face of an American citizen in prison, or held to service by another Government contrary to the law of this land, and no penalty can be adopted and enforced that is too strong to meet such an emergency.

Mr. YATES obtained the floor.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield to me for a few moments. I desire to leave to-night not to return for the rest of the session, and there are a few little matters in my charge that will not take long, which, with the indulgence of the Senate, I should be glad to bring up now.

Mr. YATES. Very well.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to call up a pension bill in favor of the widow of General Hackleman. Two other bills on the same basis were passed the other day.

Mr. CONNESS. Not while this bill is being considered.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator from California that I am about to leave the Senate for the session.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator is aware that, pending the consideration of the bill now before the Senate, a great deal of other business has been done by my consent, but I think it is time the bill was disposed of. I am perfectly willing that it shall be rejected by the Senate; it is now worth nothing, in my opinion; but I shall not consent, for one, to any other business transpiring until it is disposed of. I desire at least to get rid of it.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator from California that the business I desire to present will take but a few minutes.

Mr. CONNESS. It is only a few minutes ago since I gave way, when one objection would have stopped it, to the passage of a bill presented by the Senator from New Hampshire. There was a very plain understanding in the Senate that this bill should be gone on with; and yet as soon as that was disposed of there was a motion, which very nearly carried, to go into executive session.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There will be a meeting to-night to consider pension bills.

Mr. MORTON. I am going away in the evening train.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from Indiana if there be no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I have objected, and I cannot help it, although I do not wish to object.

Mr. THAYER. Then to accommodate the Senator from Indiana I move that the bill under consideration be laid aside informally.

Mr. CONNESS. The bills which the honorable Senator from Indiana has in charge can be taken up in the Senate afterward and passed whether he be here or not. I will present them to the Senate or any other Senator will.

Mr. MORTON. I shall be compelled to leave the Senate in a very little while, and that was the only reason I presented the matter now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the pending bill be laid aside informally.

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska make his motion to postpone for any particular time?

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Chair will go on with the business under the rules. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the question to be on laying aside the pending bill informally, but that is a motion which can only be entertained by unanimous consent, and objection has been made.

Mr. THAYER. I move that the pending bill be laid aside for twenty minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is in order.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, to postpone the bill before the Senate for twenty minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. EMMA WILSON.

Mr. MORTON. I move now to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 174.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of Mrs. Emma Wilson, of the State of Indiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Mrs. Emma Wilson, of Indiana, the salary which would have become due to her deceased husband, James Wilson, as minister to Venezuela, had he survived in that office till the close of the year ending with the date of his appointment.

Mr. MORTON. This bill was reported adversely by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] upon the ground that the precedents did not authorize it; but I am informed that the precedents do authorize the payment of a quarter's salary; and as this lady is in very destitute circumstances I move to amend the bill by providing the salary for a quarter instead of for a year.

Mr. SUMNER. I should have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "Indiana," in line four, and inserting "one quarter's salary of her deceased husband, James Wilson, as minister to Venezuela."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

MRS. GENERAL HACKLEMAN.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 627.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 627) granting an increase of pension to Sarah Hackleman, widow of Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah Hackleman, widow of the late Brigadier General Pleasant A. Hackleman, at the rate of fifty dollars per month, from the 3d of October, 1862, on which day General Hackleman fell mortally wounded at the battle of Corinth, to continue during widowhood. The pension heretofore allowed her under general law is to be discontinued, but the sum heretofore received by her is to be deducted from the pension hereby granted.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to say that this is another of those special acts increasing pensions. We have a general law which gives to the widows of officers of the rank of lieutenant colonel and above a pension of thirty dollars a month. We passed, I think without reflection, some time ago, five or six bills increasing these pensions in special cases to fifty dollars a month, and this is one of that class. As I said the other day, I am opposed to all this special legislation. If these pensions ought to be increased let us have a general bill. If it is to be done for any one let us increase them all. I am not in favor of taking out particular isolated cases to double the pensions.

Mr. MORTON. I could not hear what the Senator from Pennsylvania said; but I will state that the other day the Senate passed three bills of the same character increasing the pensions in the same way of the widows of three brigadier generals who fell on the field of battle.

General Hackleman was killed while leading his brigade at the battle of Corinth, and left a large family quite poor. There cannot be a more deserving and worthy case than this.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to say a very few words, and I shall not consume much time. Heretofore the rule established for the regulation of pensions provided that the pension should begin at the date of its allowance. Afterward by law it was changed so as to begin at the date of the filing of the application. Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that they are reversing both the old rule and the recent law, and are establishing the precedent of going back to a former date. The amount of pensions now paid is considerably over thirty millions a year. It is equal to the interest on a capital of several hundred millions. It seems to me that we ought not to permit these precedents to multiply, for we may have to go back in every individual case. Suppose an appeal were made to the Senate in favor of the widow of a private, it would be perhaps quite as strong as that in favor of the widow of a general or of a colonel. It seems to me that the Senate ought to be a little careful in the establishment of precedents of this kind that will take from the Treasury millions of money more than was contemplated when the laws were originally passed. I have nothing to say in opposition to this particular case. I have no doubt that it is equally meritorious with any of those that have been passed by the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I would say that the bills which were passed the other day were in the same form with this, and the Senator, I think, made the same objection to those bills that he now makes to this; but notwithstanding that they passed the Senate in the form in which this is I hope there will be no discrimination made between them, but that this bill will be passed as it is.

Mr. THAYER. I will simply say that I believe there are not four more cases of this character in the whole country.

Mr. CAMERON. There are at least seven or eight hundred; perhaps a thousand.

Mr. MORTON. Brigadier generals killed?

Mr. CAMERON. Not brigadier generals, but officers from the rank of lieutenant colonel up. We had four hundred generals, I believe. I am perfectly willing that there should be a higher pension in all these cases; I am not saying anything against that, but I oppose this system of special legislation by which a Senator or Representative, powerful and popular in the House of which he is a member, is enabled to urge a particular case from his own State, and the Senate vote for it without reflecting on it further than that this Senator has presented it. This principle will add millions of money to your pension list if you go on and carry it out. For the generals alone who have died either on the battle field or soon afterward it would be $1,200,000.

The first excuse was that the officer had died on the field of battle, and the Pension Committee refused to act on bills granting an increased pension in those cases, but referred them to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they made it a special case because the individuals actually died while the conflict was going on. This goes a little further; this is a case where the officer died afterward, as I understand. He was a worthy and proper officer, undoubtedly, but he died after the battle was over. If you go on in this way you will bring in every case. Let us put it off until next year, and if our soldiers and the widows and orphans of our officers and soldiers have not pension enough let us increase it; make the sum as large as you please, and I will vote for it; but do not let us pick out these individual cases, and pass special bills now at the close of the session.

Mr. MORTON. I would say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that General Hackleman was shot dead on his horse at the head of his brigade at the battle of Corinth. As to the number of these cases the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely mistaken. I am informed by one member of the Committee on Military Affairs that there are not exceeding three or four cases of this kind.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How many privates were shot dead in the field?

Mr. MORTON. I understand that Congress has made distinctions in regard to pensions.

Mr. CONKLING. There were thirty generals killed in battle, I understand; so the chairman of the Committee on Pensions tells me.

Mr. MORTON. I think those cases have all been provided for with the exception of three our four. I hope there will be no distinction made between this case and those which received the sanction of this body only two days ago.

Mr. CAMERON. This is the seventh case.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If there were thirty cases the amount would be $18,000 a year. This bill proposes to give to the widow of General Hackleman just what has been given to the widows of other generals by the vote of the Senate within a few days. We ask simply for her what has been given to others. General Hackleman left but a small estate, although a lawyer of distinction. He left his business and went to the war, and left to his family but a home. His widow has been dependent on her personal efforts for her support and the support of a family of daughters. I think he left no boy to aid in the support of the family. It is a case that appeals not only to the sense of justice but of kindness. He was a distinguished officer in whom the State of Indiana takes much pride; and I should be deeply mortified if this increased pension was allowed in other cases and denied in this.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We have a law that fixes the time when these pensions shall commence. We should either adhere to the law or change it. This variation from the law will give the Pension Committee an infinite amount of business. I have no doubt of the worthiness of the applicant in this case; but I have a case for which I presented a bill at this session—the case of a lady who lost her husband, shot dead in the battle near the city of Mexico, and whose son also was killed in the recent rebellion. If this bill passes will it not furnish a precedent for a case of that kind—a widow and a mother having lost her husband and son, the only means of her support, both in battles of our country? The law makes a distinction in the amount of pay according to grade, whether to a private, a colonel, or a brigadier. Is not that a sufficient distinction? It seems to me that we cannot withstand the petitions in behalf of the widows of captains and lieutenants and privates if we break down this rule. I hope, if we have a rule, we shall adhere to it.

Mr. HOWE. I understand this bill was not reported by the Pension Committee, but by the Military Committee.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator that the committee reported four or five bills of the same kind at the same time, this being one. There were three or four of them passed the other day, and I got up to present this bill, but a motion to adjourn intervened, and the bill was cut off.

Mr. HOWE. I rise to inquire whether the other bills alluded to by the Senator from Indiana came from the same committee?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; from the same committee, and were reported at the same time.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to move an amendment of this sort—the Clerk can put it in form—that the same proportionate amount of pensions be paid to the widows of all the officers and soldiers who were killed in battle during the rebellion. Now, let us make the list complete.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. There seems to be a little misapprehension about the pension law as it now stands. All pensions take effect, if the application is made in time, from the death of the party or from the time his disability was incurred, or from the muster-out. The objection made to this bill by the Senator from Iowa, as I understand it, is this: this bill proposes, not to grant a pension, because I suppose there are no pensions but those allowed by law until the bill is passed, at least, but proposes, in addition to the regular pension which this lady already has of thirty dollars a month, to grant her twenty dollars a month more. As I understand, the motion of the Senator from Iowa is to prevent that increase from going back and to make it commence from the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to amend the bill by adding as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That the same proportionate increase of pension be paid to the widows of all officers and soldiers who were killed in battle during the late rebellion, such pensions to commence from the date of the death of said officers and soldiers.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know what became of the order of the Senate postponing the regular order twenty minutes. Does the Chair keep any account of the time?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Let us finish this bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for information of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not informed precisely. He thinks the twenty minutes are up.

Mr. CONNESS. If this bill could be disposed of in a few minutes I would not object.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to the Senator from California that we can dispose of it in a minute or two.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It cannot be disposed of with that amendment extending pensions to all.

Mr. MORTON. That amendment is intended for the simple purpose of killing the bill. I hope that it will be voted down, and that we shall then take a vote on the bill. It will be hard to explain the reason why the Senate should vote differently on this bill than they did on the other four the day before yesterday.

Mr. CAMERON. It is hardly fair to say that this is offered for the purpose of killing the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the twenty minutes have expired all this debate is out of order, and I object to further debate. There is no use in spending further time upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The twenty minutes having expired it becomes the duty of the Chair to announce that the other bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the time will be extended thirty minutes more.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is no reason why the other cases should be provided for and this one not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There may be a good many cases.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senate have given this increase to others, and we want the same to General Hackleman's widow. It is a simple act of justice and right. I ask that the time be extended for thirty minutes.

Mr. CONNESS. Upon that I shall call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Try it by a division in the first place.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well; I withdraw the call.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will say, then, ten minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on extending the time for ten minutes. The question being put, the motion was declared to be agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for a division. The Chair cannot decide questions. It belongs to the Senate to decide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 15.

Several SENATORS. No quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a quorum.

Mr. CONKLING. Is that a quorum?

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; there is not a quorum.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I suppose the Chair makes just a quorum.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays. We have got to have them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would rather withdraw the motion than have so much strife over it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is before the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. Is there a quorum?

Mr. CONKLING. It was given up.

Mr. WILSON. It cannot be given up. We have got to ascertain the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote lacked one of a quorum; but the Senator from Pennsylvania afterward rose, assuring the Chair that there was a quorum in the body.

Mr. FERRY. Is the regular order before the Senate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the yeas and nays are not called I do not withdraw my motion. I thought the yeas and nays were called for. I believe the motion was carried.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was carried without a quorum, and afterward the Senator from Pennsylvania rose, which made a quorum. Which side he voted upon the Chair did not learn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. He says he voted ay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He could not vote ay after the vote had been declared. If the thing is to be brought up again I object to that irregular mode of proceeding. We are spending our whole time here over pension bills and the like when we have very important business which must be transacted.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator has consumed more time in objecting than would have been required to pass the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It would have passed if there had not been objection, and if there had been no objection from others I should have made none. I think we ought to go on with the business that must be disposed of and not proceed with such bills as these.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 252) to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota;

A bill (S. No. 286) to incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America;

A bill (S. No. 357) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming;

A bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska; and

A bill (S. No. 492) to extend the time for the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad in the State of California.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS ABROAD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, being the bill (H. R. No. 768) concerning the rights of American citizens abroad, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. I have modified my amendment, striking out some useless words in it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as modified, which was to insert at the end of the third section the following words:

And whenever any citizen of the United States shall be, or shall have been, unlawfully arrested or unlawfully detained by any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President, on receiving information thereof, to demand the release and liberation of such citizen, and in case of the refusal or unreasonable delay of such foreign Government to release such citizen it shall be the duty of the President to withdraw the diplomatic representative of the United States from such foreign Government, and to refuse to hold any further diplomatic correspondence with any representative of such foreign Government until justice shall be done in the matter by such foreign Government.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear the whole of that section read as it will stand if amended. It is very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be reported as it will stand if amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President to exert all his powers under the Constitution and laws for the protection and relief of citizens of the United States abroad, and to report promptly to Congress from time to time all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizen by the Government of any foreign country, and whenever any citizen of the United States shall be, or shall have been, unlawfully arrested or unlawfully detained by any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President, on receiving information thereof, to demand the release and liberation of such citizen; and in case of the refusal or unreasonable delay of such foreign Government to release such citizen, it shall be the duty of the President to withdraw the diplomatic representative of the United States from such foreign Government, and to refuse to hold further diplomatic correspondence with any representative of such foreign Government until justice shall be done in the matter by such foreign Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to make an inquiry? Is that a substitution for the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is an addition to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If so, it is inconsistent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is pointing out to the State Department and the President exactly what they shall do in a case that has not yet happened; judging beforehand and telling them what they shall do, when at the time it may be very unwise to do it. I am opposed to such legislation as that.

Mr. HOWARD. I think the Senator from Maine misapprehends the drift and effect of my amendment. It does not require the President in such a case as that to withdraw the American representative from the foreign Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the language?

Mr. HOWARD. He may do it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He can do that without this.

Mr. HOWARD. But he must refuse to hold any further intercourse with the representative of that Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is, we may leave our representative there, but he shall refuse to receive theirs here.

Mr. YATES. Mr. President, I had intended to make some remarks on this bill suggested by the debate which has occurred upon it; and probably what I intended to say is not as applicable to the present posture of the bill as it would have been before. But I rose for the purpose of expressing my approval of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. I think the action of the Government in all such cases should be deliberate, should be cautious; but at the same time the opinion and the position of our Government should be clearly understood. I approve of the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, because it does not contain that filibustering element, that upon a mere primary case there shall be a declaration of war. I believe that the Government should assert its position on this subject, and certainly it could not do it more effectually or more to the point than by saying that with any Government which arrests or imprisons an American citizen, the Government of the United States will suspend all diplomatic correspondence.

Mr. President, I should not have risen to speak on this question at all except to say that as little as this question may be regarded by some and pronounced a mere filibustering or a mere electioneering proposition, there is substance in it; there is right in it; there is justice in it. No American citizen, whether he is a native born or a naturalized citizen, or whether he has simply declared his intention to be naturalized, should be denied the protection of the Government of the United States.

Two parties are now before the people of the United States. In 1864 the Democratic party of the United States, representing every State in the Union, assembled in Chicago, and presided over by Horatio Seymour, the candidate of the Democratic party at this time for the Presidency, declared by solemn resolution that the war which was then being prosecuted to suppress the rebellion was a failure. The man who presided at the head of that convention which made that declaration, and which sent discouragement to our troops in the Army, and encouragement and aid and sympathy to the rebels, is now the declared candidate of the Democratic convention lately assembled in New York for the Presidency of the United States. Sir, we met that convention before the people, we met them upon the field of battle, and we planted our flag where ever traitor hands had pulled it down. We consigned that convention, presided over by Horatio Seymour, upon that issue that the war was a failure, to the tomb of oblivion, and we triumphed, and gloriously triumphed.

But, sir, that was not all. That convention declared that there should be no proclamation of emancipation, that there should be no freedom to the slaves of the South. The Republican party took up the issue, and they have given life and liberty to four millions of God's long oppressed and downtrodden poor. This is what has been accomplished by the Republican party. Not only that, but the Republican party, opposed by the whole strength of the Democratic party, said they would confer the rights of freemen in the South upon these four millions of the oppressed, and they have done so.

I rise now simply to say that the mission of the Republican party is to give liberty to the captives and rights to the emancipated; to confer not only freedom but equal rights and equal suffrage upon every man on the whole continent of North America, whether in the North or in the South, without distinction of color, race, or condition.

Moreover, the Republican party now plants upon its banner, in defiance of all opposition, that without regard to nativity, wherever a man may be born, in any empire, upon any continent or island, wherever the American flag floats, there will float protection to the American citizen, whether he be native born or naturalized, whether he be born in this country or any other land. Mr. President, this is the doctrine; this is the gospel of the Republican party—equal rights to all at home and abroad; equal rights to all without regard to color or nativity. I could not let this occasion pass without saying that this is the flag beneath which we fight; this is the ensign by which we conquer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD. I call for the yeas and nays upon that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Chandler, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Harlan, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Ny, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Wade, Welch, Williams, Wilson and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Conkling, Deolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelighuysen, Harris, Hendricks, Morrill of Vermont, Morrill, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Willey—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cattell, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Drake, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Norton, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Tipton, and Whyte—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I have an amendment which I wish to offer in the nature of a substitute for the whole bill. I move to strike out all of the preamble and all after the enacting clause, and substitute after the enacting clause the amendment that I send to the Chair.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not in order.

Mr. FERRY. If it is not in order I will wait until it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it to be in order. I understand it as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. FERRY. In the nature of a substitute.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President—

Mr. FERRY. Let it be read, and we shall see.

Mr. CONNESS. This is a substitute for the preamble and bill. I ask whether it is in order to act on the preamble now at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. FERRY. Then I will leave out the part in regard to the preamble, and move to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert:

That all naturalized citizens of the United States while in foreign States shall be entitled to, and shall receive from this Government, the same protection of persons and property that is accorded to native-born citizens.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the rights of any citizen of the United States who may be in any foreign country shall be infringed by the Government of that country, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to extend to the citizen so injured the protection of this Government by every necessary means in accordance with the law of nations and the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. STEWART called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. This question has assumed a great many shapes since it has been before the Senate; and this I think one of its most effeminate ones; one of its most lame and impotent ones. If language could be employed so that less could be expected from any act passed on the subject there could be no greater success realized than in the language employed here. I should expect it would get the votes of those who simply desire to offer to men incarcerated in prison fine words and platitudes, but of none others.

Mr. FERRY. The subject-matter which has engaged the attention of the Senate so long is one which, in my judgment, does require some legislative action. We have had from time to time in the history of this Government complaints made of the action of foreign Governments upon such of their former subjects as had become naturalized citizens of the United States. It was evident early that the difficulty grew out of the old doctrine of perpetual allegiance held generally by the European Powers and practically denied in this country under our system of naturalization. It was, therefore, evident to every intelligent man that it was impossible to accomplish a perfect remedy except through the treaty-making power. To change the law of nations by a municipal statute is a thing which every intelligent person knows cannot be accomplished. Consequently the Government for a considerable period past has been taking the right, proper course to remedy the evils complained of, to wit, by negotiation and the exchange of treaties.

But recently there has been in one foreign country an insurrection, more or less formidable. In that insurrection citizens of the United States, both naturalized and native born, are said to have been auxiliaries. I do not know whether the fact was so or not. It is said to be so. The insurrection was unsuccessful, and citizens of the United States were arrested, charged with violation of the municipal law of the country in which they were arrested, convicted, and are now imprisoned. It is asserted that the conviction and imprisonment are wrongful, contrary to the law of nations, and especially contrary to the principles of this Government, so far as those principles demand its protection to its naturalized as well as its native citizens. Now, sir, I hold, and I have always held, as a matter of national duty, that we must extend to our naturalized citizens all over the globe, wherever they may go in the pursuit of business or pleasure, the same protection which we extend to our native-born citizens; and the object which is sought to be accomplished by this bill is to effectuate such protection whenever it shall be needed.

The difficulty we have had is this: we have been undertaking to pass a municipal law which could not have any extra territorial efficacy for the purpose of affecting the status of citizens of the United States charged with offenses against the municipal laws of other countries. No one, I suppose, not even the Senator from California, desires that this Government shall do more than protect its citizens, whether native or naturalized, against injuries inflicted upon them by foreign Governments.

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly not.

Mr. FERRY. But my friend, the Senator from California, desires a bill to point out some specific kind of protection in some specific mode. I must say that in my judgment the original bill, as passed by the House of Representatives and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate, in attempting to point out a specific mode of extending this protection went back in civilization and undertook to introduce here into our practice customs which have been abandoned by the civilized world for ages.

The thing which we wish to do, and which we ought to do, is to impose upon the President of the United States, the executive power of the country, a specific duty which he shall be enabled to perform without the necessity of referring the subject-matter in every instance to Congress. I have not been in favor of the propositions here made to refer the information the President may receive to Congress, because the delay thus occasioned might be very injurious to the rights of American citizens, and yet the President of the United States might not feel authorized, without legislation, to employ some of the means known to the law of nations, and which he might exercise by the law of nations, for the protection of American citizens injured by foreign Governments without a reference of the subject-matter to Congress, as in Congress rests the responsibility of declaring war and making peace, and the President might feel, without legislation authorizing him to take the preliminary steps which might ultimately lead to war, that he ought not to take them without a reference to Congress.

The amendment which I have proposed clothes expressly the President of the United States, without a reference of the information which has been communicated by him to Congress, with the power of using all the needful means to extend the protection of the Government over a citizen who is injured by a foreign Government—all needful means known to the law of nations and under the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States. I ask what more can any reasonable man want? I am not a naturalized citizen; I am a native-born citizen, but I, for one, as a native-born citizen, would ask no further law than that which is embodied in the amendment which I have presented, anywhere upon the face of this broad earth; for wherever I might be, under the operation of that law I should feel that the Executive of my country would employ whatever needful means were authorized by the law of nations and the organic and other laws of the United States for my protection if I were injured abroad. If there be nothing else under this bill, and under the series of movements from which this bill has originated, than an honest desire to protect the citizens of this country in their rights while temporarily abroad, in my judgment this amendment is all-sufficient for both native and naturalized. If there be any other motive underlying the bill I do not know what it is; I do not say that there is; but it is a motive which is not revealed in the discussions of either of these two Houses, and therefore not a matter for my consideration here.

I am sorry that my friend from California deems the amendment effeminate, but it is an addition to the present body of the law, and it is an addition which, in my judgment, will confer upon the Executive of the country authority which he can employ for the protection of our citizens abroad, and it is a notice to all the Governments of the world that the executive authority of the United States will employ the means which we thus authorize and direct him to employ.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. After the President has exhausted negotiations in trying to procure the release of an American citizen arrested abroad, the amendment then provides that he shall resort to all means authorized by the law of nations and by the Constitution, treaties, and laws of the United States. I ask him now to specify those means; whether he refers to the withdrawal of diplomatic intercourse or the suspension of commercial relations; whether his amendment, if it means anything at all, does not carry a vast power with it. I want him to specify the means that the President may resort to under it.

Mr. FERRY. It does carry with it the power to suspend diplomatic intercourse. It does carry with it the power which has been exerted within the last few years by the fleets of this Government upon the coast of Japan. When that Government imprisoned American citizens or infringed upon their rights the fleets of the United States compelled that Government to yield and give to the citizens of the United States their rights. I would prefer to leave with the executive authority of the United States the discretion as to the means which he should employ for the purpose of securing the rights of American citizens abroad, believing that the Executive would not resort to the final arbitrament of war, or measures which should lead necessarily to war, until the legislative department also had been informed of the condition of things.

Mr. MORTON. I will ask the Senator if it authorizes the President to suspend commercial relations, and if it authorizes him to use the Army and Navy, is not that war?

Mr. FERRY. It authorizes him to use precisely what the amendment itself suggests. We have got to give to some power in this country, either the executive or the legislative department, the authority to extend the protection which in the second section of the original bill we all agree without exception in this Chamber should be extended to American citizens abroad. I think that under the amendment that I have presented any infringement upon the rights of American citizens abroad will be remedied and redressed by the interposition of the executive authority using, as it would be under our system the inevitable tendency of the executive authority to use, such preliminary means as would be carried out subsequently, if they were not effective, by the legislative department exercising its power in declaring war.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg my friend from Indiana not to suppose that there is any war in this amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. On the contrary, it is peaceful. It is as quiet as a summer morn. If adopted, it will never lead to the disturbance of one human mind in the United States of America, nor without the United States of America. It is one of those broad declarations, in effect like the common air, which serves some purpose, but no particular purpose. I very much prefer the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan, with some reconciliation of its language with that to which it is appended, or the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

While we have been talking here on this subject I sent out and obtained an article pertinent to this question, and I propose to read it as a part of my remarks. I ask the attention of the Senate to it. It is a leading article in the New York Sun of yesterday, a paper edited by one of the ablest writers in this country. It is not a party paper, and I present what it says both as to the facts stated and the conclusions drawn therefrom, as a fair index of public opinion on this subject, and as very much at variance with the statement of facts asserted yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is predicated upon a particular case, that is one case, the arrest and detention of the prisoners taken from the Jacmel packet. It will be remembered that some of those have been discharged by Great Britain, and have reached the United States. All that were discharged were native Americans, and no native Americans now remain in custody. All that were held and are now in confinement were naturalized citizens. I proceed to read the article:

"The Case of Warren and Costello.—The case of Colonels Warren and Costello, who were arrested and convicted in Ireland on a charge of being connected with the Jacmel expedition, and which we have so frequently alluded to in these columns, was brought under the notice of the British Government in the House of Commons on last Thursday night. Lord Mayo stated that there was no peculiar feature in the case which would lead the Government to depart from the usual course of the law; that is, in plain English, they must serve out the term of their imprisonment; that their claim to be regarded as American citizens is utterly ignored; that our naturalization laws are held in contempt by the British Government, and afford no protection whatever to such American citizens as Colonels Warren and Costello. Notwithstanding the opinion of Lord Mayo, we regard this as a very peculiar case—so peculiar as to be at this moment not only engrossing the attention of our Senate, but exciting the deep interest of the entire American people, whose national consequence abroad has been lowered in the persons of those men who are now held in a British prison without having been tried according to that form of international law which, as American citizens, they demanded."

That relates to the making up of the jury, they having been denied the privilege of the statute provided by Great Britain itself of giving a mixed jury:

"The same evidence, the same informers, the same agency, and espionage were brought to bear against Colonel Nagle and the other captives of the so-called expedition, and yet they were released and permitted to return to this country. Is it not somewhat peculiar that Warren and Costello should be doomed to lie in jail while their fellow-voyagers are set at large? It would be more peculiar still if our people should allow this subject to rest with the statement of Lord Mayo, and the appeals for justice of any of our citizens who may have been illegally tried to be stifled within the four walls of an English dungeon. The action taken by Colonel Warren at the time of his arraignment has forced the whole naturalization question upon the attention of the British Government and driven them into a corner from which there is no safe retreat, and thus embittered them against him; and they are resolved, if forced to relinquish their old feudal claims, to retain and wreak their vengeance upon his person."

"The British Government are not, it would seem, acting in good faith with us regarding this naturalization question, for Lord Stanley stated in the House of Commons also on Thursday evening that although they were prepared to accept the American view of it, still that he declined to make a treaty at present, as the royal commission is still considering the general subject, and for the additional reason that time will not permit the passage of a bill at the present session of Parliament."

"In view of such language the Senate should act promptly on the bill which is now before it. Whatever legislative action England may think fit to take in this matter the duty of our Government is clear. We are the aggrieved party, the rights of our citizens have been invaded, and we cannot afford to have their recognition everywhere, in every country under the sun, postponed for a single day."

But, sir, we do.

"This is a question of national importance, and must not be diplomatically trifled with."

Thus speaks one of the independent journals of this country, not written in the interests of any political party, nor seeking votes, but representing an American opinion, the existence of which cannot be denied on this subject. Sir, in face of the facts alleged, and which are unquestionably true as stated in this article, we are here trifling with the question, and proposing general declarations that give the President of the United States no more power than he has to-day; that make it his duty to perform no specific action, that do not take one single step to the release of our incarcerated and oppressed citizens.

I regret, Mr. President, very much, indeed, that I felt it to be my duty to press this question upon the attention of the Senate. It has been to me a very unpleasant task. But, sir, I could not fill the place I hold here and do less than I have done. I regret more deeply still the manner in which it has been received and treated, the efforts from time to time to avoid action on the subject, the preference given again and again to motions to go into executive session, to consider first one bill and then another, the attempts to put it aside, and finally the manner in which we meet it. It is a question, it appears to me, in which we are all equally interested, and upon which it becomes our first duty to act. I cannot conceive, without endeavoring to add any force of language to the statement, how any man can rest quietly while he knows and is conscious that one of our citizens is deprived of his rights of liberty. To deny that that is the case is to deny the plainest and most palpable facts. The denial may be made here again and again, but the millions of this country will believe the statement to be true. It has been stated, and I reiterate it, that both political parties recognize this opinion in the country and have made declarations which are creditable to them upon this subject. Let us stand up to the declarations we have made. Let us exact only what is right, and let us submit to nothing that is wrong.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I like to consider this subject in the spirit of the accomplished journalist and thinker whose article a few moments ago was read. It is an important subject, deeply interesting and disturbing in many of its bearings; and because it is so it is fit in this Council Chamber to be deliberately treated and to receive, in such form as legislation in regard to it may take, at least that measure of discernment which we find when we open our statute-books at large.

I do not believe that the conviction felt with regard to it here is confined to any one or two Senators; nor do I believe that intense and extravagant language in denunciation of this measure or of any measure is likely to conduce to its perfection or to the wise conclusion of the Senate. Legislation, in its best estate, is the average judgment of the members of the body by which the legislation is matured; and when to this measure is given the best embodied judgments of the Senate it has received from us all that we have the power to give.

I agree with the Senator from Connecticut in thinking that a large part of the difficulties with which we have met are difficulties of administration, if they be faults at all. The Senator truly said that disrespect, want of consideration, has been shown for our naturalization laws. That is not the fault of those laws, as he justly intimated, but it is precisely what the statement imports, that laws upon our statute-book have not in extra territorial consideration received the weight and been allowed the action and the force which we would gladly claim for them.

In this statement there is a great deal to curtail the function of legislation; yet I am not disposed to deny that legislation may be made useful on this subject; and for myself I can assure the Senate, and assure anybody who observes the action of the Senate that I have but one purpose in the votes I give on this subject; that purpose is to arrive at the best conclusion, to adopt the most perfect and the most effectual measure to secure respect for the rights of all our citizens, be they native or adopted, in every land, however remote it may be. I think, sir, speaking of the legislative action of those around me, that is the purpose of the whole Senate without, perhaps, that enthusiasm, that warmth of espousal, that demonstrative enthusiasm which, for reasons having nothing to do with considerations of legislation, particular persons may feel.

Now, Mr. President, coming to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, I think his position as its mover is very like that of a plaintiff in ejectment, who should be permitted to recover more upon the weakness of his adversary's title than upon the strength of his own. I do not mean to disparage his amendment, but I mean to say that the strong point in its favor which lies at the threshold in my estimation is the imperfection, the misfortune, as I conceive, of the measure in lieu of which he offers it. The Senate has adopted a provision which I have before me, and which, among other things, provides that in all cases whatsoever, be their history or circumstance what they may, of the detention of a citizen by a foreign Power despite a demand of the American Executive, it shall be his duty, all discretion being dispensed with, to suspend all diplomatic relations with the Power thus refusing. There are various criticisms to be made upon this. One general criticism which may be made is by supposing for a moment such an act as that to stand upon a British statute-book, putting away that feeling of distrust and disquiet, which in spite of us enters the minds of all, growing out of the want of confidence felt in the present Executive of this country, and looking at this measure as a permanent one, to stand under future Administrations, I ask Senators to consider how it would be regarded if it were the act of the British Parliament, if the ministry of England were not only clothed with power, but specifically directed in all cases, under all circumstances, however variant they might be, to suspend diplomatic relations at once with any and every foreign Power between whom and Great Britain a certain question might arise.

Mr. President, not to dwell upon it, I think I may say that, viewed in the light of statesmanship and public policy, such a statute would be received with the derision of all Europe; and why? Because it is the absorption of purely administrative discretion, because it is an attempt to compass an impossibility, to make provision beforehand for questions which have not arisen, upon facts which cannot be foreseen, and to have that provision uniform, alike in all cases. I will not detain the Senate with any disquisition upon what I conceive to be the fallacy generally of such a proposition, but I wish to ask attention in the interest of this measure to one single objection.

The proposition is that upon a citizen or citizens being detained in a foreign country, and a demand for their release and a refusal to comply with that demand having occurred, the President shall at once suspend diplomatic relations. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the fact that the amendment is not, as he supposed, one giving discretion to the President to do that, but containing this language:

"It shall be the duty of the President to withdraw the diplomatic representative of the United States from such foreign Government, and to refuse to hold further diplomatic correspondence with any representative of such Government until," &c.

Now, Mr. President, look at this one moment in the interest of any citizen who may be thus detained. Is there any moment when the interest of a citizen, native or adopted, detained in a foreign country, requires so much as that interest requires at the time of his detention, a representative of his Government to whom he can appeal? I submit it is the occasion of all others, looking to the interests of a citizen detained abroad, when you do want a diplomatic representative there to negotiate for him, on his behalf, and for his release, and yet here is a proposition that instantly, without giving the President a discretion by which he can wait a day or two until dispatches might pass by cable and ascertain whether leaving the diplomatic representative there might not be the very instrumentality by which release could be obtained, without leaving even that measure of discretion to him, we provide that, hit or miss, wise or otherwise, he shall at once sunder all diplomatic relations by withdrawing our minister and compelling the minister of that Government here to demand his passports so that both countries shall be mute and isolated from each other.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from New York will observe, if he looks into the amendment carefully, that this cessation of diplomatic intercourse cannot take place, according to the provisions of the amendment, until after the foreign Government has either actually refused to comply with our demand, or until after it shall have unreasonably delayed a compliance; so that the language does not tie the President up so closely and unconditionally as the Senator seems to suppose. There would be, as a matter of course, abundant time for further negotiation unless the foreign Government makes a positive refusal to comply, and then I submit to the Senate in such a case as that, after a demand from the United States has been formally made and formally refused, whether it is becoming our Government for the future to hold diplomatic intercourse with the recalcitrant Government?

Mr. CONKLING. I differ entirely with the Senator, and I base my argument upon the precise point which he thinks vindicates this proposition. Now, let me beg the attention of Senators, for one moment to this point, for it is a very simple one: "and in case of the refusal." I stop just there; I want nothing further objectionable in the amendment upon which to base my proposition. Upon the refusal to surrender, it shall be the duty of the President to withdraw the diplomatic representative. Consider, Mr. President, the operation of that provision. A citizen has been detained in Dublin, and a statement comes here by cable of the facts. The President makes a demand that he shall be released. Upon the case, as then understood, he is met by a flat refusal. The British Government say, "No, we decline and refuse to release this man; we hold him as a culprit charged under our laws, and we mean to try him." What is to follow that? What, in the ordinary course of human transactions and of wisdom, would follow? One would think the first step on the part of the friends of the person detained and his Government would be to institute an inquiry to see whether some other person might not be the one charged; whether, from a similarity of names or description, some mistake had not occurred; or whether, although a prima facie case might exist, it might not turn out upon investigation that this refusal might be withdrawn, and that the two Governments might meet in assent. But in lieu of that, by this provision, it would be the unbending duty of the Executive instantly to require our representative to demand his passports and return home, and, at the same time, to dismiss the representative of the British Government here.

I pass over the extraordinary character of this legislation; I pass over the criticism to which, for general reasons, it might be subject; and I ask, as a practical proposition looking solely to the interests of citizens abroad in imprisonment, whether it is wise first of all to deprive them of the instrumentality of all others which, in all human probability, they need? It seems to me that in place of a provision withdrawing diplomatic representatives, a provision which would enable the President to increase them, to send rather a special ambassador, or an embassy of some kind to negotiate for the release of American citizens would be a far more friendly and a far more effectual line of legislation.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this provision, if it could be carried into a law, would have no effect so certain as an effect injurious to the rights of those whom we really wish to protect; and, therefore, such a proposition as was offered by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, or the proposition as it stood upon the motion of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, in my eye is far more beneficial; not because it is weaker, not because it is expressed with bated breath, not because it is toned down into a heartless one of zeal and vigor, but because, if I put myself in the supposed position of one detained in a foreign country, I would infinitely rather rely upon a discreet exercise of all the powers which may be conferred upon the Executive than to depend upon the fortune of one single expedient. Without this and with the bill as it stood, what should we have in general on this subject? We should have an act not only declaring to the nations of the world our determination to maintain in all instances and in all countries the rights and immunities of American citizens, home born and foreign born alike, but a legislative injunction laying upon the Executive the command of Congress that all the powers, every prerogative that he can wield under the Constitution and laws of the country, should be exerted in the case of the humblest citizen who might be detained anywhere upon any pretext.

If you assume that we are to have a dishonest, an imbecile, a rash, a guilty Executive, I admit that the practical argument is very strong against trusting this or any other matter to his discretion; and if we were legislating merely during the brief term of the present Executive, I have no hesitation in saying that any measure committing to him a discretion which might be withheld, and which was liable to abuse, might not be, in my judgment, altogether indefensible and unwise. If the present Executive was to administer a law like this permanently, or if a successor following in his footsteps and resembling him in public character were to administer it, I admit, without an argument, that that fact would exert a controlling influence with me as to the measure of discretion that I should confide and as to the power that I would commit to him. But we are making a statute to stand permanently, to be administered presently by an Executive in whom a majority of the members of this body have confidence, and to be administered in the far future, we have a right to believe, by those who will have regard to the spirit, the genius, and the duties which are elements in this case. Looking to that, I confess I would infinitely rather trust to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut, liable as it may be to the criticism made by the Senator from Indiana, that acts amounting to causes of war might be done under it, and criticised on the other hand, as it has been, as lacking vigor, as being empty of power, than to commit myself and the rights of American citizens to a fixed rule of this sort, which I conceive would work injuriously in a majority of instances, and which, as an act to be done at once without preliminaries except those provided here, I believe would be unwise in all cases.

With or without the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, except for this provision offered by the Senator from Michigan, the President of the United States has the power to suspend diplomatic relations, and that power as it stands now is tempered only by a discretion. The change here is to make it absolute, to prejudice for ourselves upon all cases likely to arise in the future that when a certain stage arrives in the negotiations relationship shall be sundered. Can there be, I submit to the honorable Senator who offered this provision, one argument for that except want of confidence in the executive government? If he believes a sound discretion would be exercised, then in theory of law that discretion would concur with the judgment which we should form upon the given case stated; but the amendment presupposes that we cannot trust now or in the future any discretion as a concomitant of this power. We must leave the executive authority to suspend diplomatic relations, and take from it all capacity to judge whether the power shall be exercised or not, and at what time that exercise shall take place.

Now, sir, I trust as a friend of this measure, and as one willing to vote for the strongest provision which can be defended upon principles of sound policy, the provision most likely to work out the vindication everywhere of American citizens, be they home born or adopted, that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will be adopted. A great mistake will be made if it is assumed on either side that those who are not able to go for every proposition which on its face looks dashing, looks vigorous, looks effective, are restrained from doing so by some want of interest which they feel in the subject, some lack of zeal to reach the end. That is a great mistake, I believe, as to a majority of this body. I know that it is an entire mistake as to myself, for the proposition which shall receive my vote first and last is that one, based upon sound principles, which seems to me to be the most effectual and the most certain in securing the rights of those whom we are seeking to protect; and as between the proposition as it now stands and the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Connecticut I shall vote for his amendment, not because it is weaker on the one hand, not because it is rasher and more likely to be productive of war, as has been suggested, on the other, but because, making the case my own, looking at my own interest, if I were thrown into a British dungeon I would rather have all the powers of my Government exercised with the discretion tolerated by the pending amendment than to have the abrupt experiment of withdrawing from the country in which I might be detained the representative of my own Government, and banishing from my own Government the representative of that Government, leaving the two parties estranged from each other, and me to abide the fortunes of some shadowy by and by.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from New York has directed his remarks in the main against the amendment which I had the honor to offer and which the Senate has already adopted. He criticises the amendment because he thinks it may encourage rash conduct on the part of the Executive.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir; I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not say that.

Mr. HOWARD. I will state to the Senator what he said. Commenting upon the amendment, he asked: suppose the President of the United States should receive a dispatch across the Atlantic cable that an American citizen was thrown into confinement in Europe, and suppose the President should instantly on the receipt of the telegraphic dispatch across the cable act upon the case and return a peremptory demand upon the British Government for the liberation of the prisoner, what then? He foresees that great trouble might arise in such a case.

Now, Mr. President, is it fair to use language like this in the way of commenting upon that amendment? Does the honorable Senator suppose that any President of the United States, whether it be the present Executive or some other Executive, would act so precipitately as he seems to apprehend he might? Does he suppose that any President would make a peremptory demand upon the Government of Great Britain for the rendition of the prisoner without having consulted upon the subject in Cabinet council, without having held a diplomatic correspondence with the proper British authorities on the subject? Why, sir, this example of danger which he holds up before us is a thing which is never likely to occur unless we have for President some insane man who is without reason, whose passions nothing can moderate, and who desires merely to involve us in a war with a foreign country. He might as well point out to us that a similar danger would arise from the communication of some spiritualistic medium to the President of the United States that a similar transaction had occurred. No, sir, there is no ground for any such apprehension. Would he be content to act upon the credit of a cable dispatch upon any subject of moment, any public matter which concerned the interests of the people of the United States? Would he act without negotiation upon paper, without consulting the British Government through our minister at the Court of St. James, without consulting the minister of the British Government here? No, sir; I know he would not; so that there is no ground for any such apprehension. The whole field is left open and unembarrassed by my amendment until there has been a formal demand made by our Government upon the foreign Government.

The President by that amendment is not required to make a demand at once, and it is implied from the very language of the amendment and the very nature of the case that such a demand should be preceded by the usual and ordinary negotiations between the two Governments. Now, sir, I put this to the honorable Senator: after having duly considered the case, after having negotiated and discussed the subject as a faithful Executive, and his Cabinet undoubtedly would do so in all cases, and after the Executive, being thus advised by his Cabinet, shall have come to the conclusion to make a peremptory demand upon the foreign Government for the redress contemplated in the amendment, would the Senator from New York continue diplomatic relations one moment after the refusal of such a demand? Could it be done with dignity? Could it be done with self-respect? The demand would necessarily imply that our own Government have obtained all the information practicable on the subject; that they have considered the question in all its bearings, and have solemnly made up their minds to make the demand. When the demand is made it is the voice of the United States requiring that the offending Government shall do us justice and surrender up the prisoner. But instead of this, it seems that the honorable Senator from New York, after the demand shall have been refused by the offending Government, would double our number of diplomatic representatives at the foreign Court, would send over additional diplomats to continue the negotiations and tease the foreign Government to comply with our demand. Sir, is that the conduct of a nation who is conscious of its own rights, who is able to show by its own strength the justice of its own claims? No, sir, it would be merely to belittle the Government in the eyes of the world to follow up a negotiation after a peremptory demand had been made and refused.

Mr. President, I have one word to say respecting the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Connecticut. If I comprehended its terms and effect while it was read at the desk I think it opens the door quite too widely; it gives too much discretion to the President of the United States. In such a case it authorizes him, if I understand it, to employ any means known to the Constitution or laws of the United States, any means recognized by existing treaties, any means recognized by the law of nations to obtain redress. This would lead at once to war. Instead of requiring the President to give the usual admonition in the form of withdrawing our minister, it would, by its very terms, authorize the President to launch the bolts of war in the first instance against the offending Government. Surely I cannot suppose the Senator from New York would place such a power in the hands of the President. Surely I cannot suppose the Senator from Connecticut would place such a power in the hands of the President. I do not think the Senator from New York would consent to such a delegation of discretionary authority. I am opposed to it, sir; but at the same time, where there has been a negotiation, and where our own Government have come to the conclusion that our claim is just, and have seen fit to make a formal demand for the liberation of the prisoner, I would go so far as to command the President of the United States to withdraw our representative from the foreign Government and cease to hold intercourse with the minister of that Government here. I would show a resentment, admonishing the offending Government that its conduct was leading gradually to a collision of arms. These intimations, in all cases I may say I think would probably finally lead to a peaceful solution of the question. I would not leave such a question as this to stand upon such vague generalities, such inconclusive language as that which is couched in the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

If we legislate upon this subject at all let us express our purpose in our legislation. As the law now stands the Senator from New York very well knows the President of the United States has no legal right to make a demand for the liberation of an American citizen abroad. I think I am correct about this; if I am wrong he can easily set me right. I think the time has come when there ought to be a statute which can be appealed to by the American citizen abroad who is suffering injustice at the hands of a foreign Government. I think that the American nation is powerful, wise, and spirited enough to understand its own rights, and to defend those rights as against all foreign Governments. I think the time has come when the name of "American citizen" should be as much respected as was the name of "Roman citizen" throughout that almost boundless empire in ancient days. I think our legislation is defective upon the subject, and that we ought to place upon our statute-book a law which regulates the rule of conduct for the executive power of the United States in such an exigency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I voted against an executive session with a great sense of its importance this morning, but with the supposition that we should be able to reach a vote upon this question without much further discussion; and I had not thought it possible that under any circumstances I should get my own consent to say a word upon this question; and I do not propose to detain, at any length, the Senate now. I had supposed that I should follow, as I usually do where I have no very distinct notions of my own, the action of the appropriate committee; but since the debate has been extended I have turned my attention to this bill, and I want to say in a very few words how it strikes me.

The difficulty, in my mind, has been to fixing some just and definite idea of what we want to accomplish. It probably results from the fact that I have paid very little attention to the discourse that the object aimed at has been so shadowy in my mind; but turning to this bill I find that the object to be accomplished is explicit, the principles which are characterized here as American principles, and which ought to be sustained it is said, are clear, well defined, and distinct; and I understand in this the committee were unanimous, and I understand as a matter of fact that the Senate is quite unanimous on the principles which ought to be maintained, and the rights of citizenship which ought to be vindicated, both as to native and naturalized citizens. What are they as defined by this bill? The first section of the bill declares that it shall be an offense for any officer of the Government of the United States to deny the right of expatriation. That the committee characterize as a high American doctrine; the right of expatriation the American Congress will vindicate. Very well; we stand on that.

What is the next proposition? The next proposition is that all naturalized citizens of the United States when in foreign States shall be entitled to the same protection as native citizens of the United States. That is the corollary, of course, of the first proposition. The whole bill turns on these two distinct propositions: first, it is the great American doctrine that the foreigner has a right to expatriate himself and become an American citizen, and becoming an American citizen no officer of the American Government shall be allowed to question that right; and further, it shall be the duty of this Government to protect the rights of the foreigner having become an American citizen precisely as we protect the rights of the native born. Of course this goes upon the assumption that there is a discrimination now in the practice of foreign countries against American citizens in this respect: that while one rule is applied to the native citizen another and a different rule is applied to the foreigner; and this bill is designed to correct that. Look at the third section:

Whenever it shall be duly made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been arrested and is detained by any foreign Government in contravention of the intent and purposes this act—

What are the intents and purposes of this act? To place the naturalized citizen upon the same ground, when abroad, as the American-born citizen. If any distinction is made between those classes of citizens abroad, what then? That is the point; what then? What will you do? The committee of the Senate say we advise that when any fact of that sort comes to the knowledge of the President, he shall at some convenient season tell Congress of it; and that is all there is in their proposition. If Congress is away the American citizen will be under the injustice until Congress gets together. No duty whatever is imposed upon the President, except some time in his own way, to tell the American Congress what he knows about it. It contemplates nothing on the part of the President of the United States save only that he shall acquaint Congress with the fact, and in the mean time the rights which you say are sacred by this bill and which shall not be discriminated against are infringed and violated, and the subject of your authority and your power lies in a foreign prison. Now, all the remark I make on that subject is to submit that in view of the high sounding principles of the bill, the remedy of the Committee on Foreign Relations is not at all adequate. I submit that the chairman of that committee does not propose any remedy at all, and I submit that having declared against making any discrimination between citizens abroad, which implies that such discriminations are made, it becomes the Congress of the United States to put into the hands of the President the exercise of some authority which shall be instant and immediate. I am not now discussing what they ought to do, but I say the remedy applied, whatever it is, should be instant and immediate for relief. Therefore I shall not give my assent to the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

What is the next proposition? I do not know that I shall get them in order, but the next proposition to which I shall advert is that introduced by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.] He agrees to the premises of this bill; he agrees to all that is said in vindication of the rights of naturalized citizens residing abroad; but what is his remedy? He says that if it comes to the knowledge of the President that the rights of naturalized citizens have been discriminated against in the way contemplated by this bill, the President shall do what? He shall exert all his power to protect the rights of such citizen and report the facts to Congress. The Senator from Pennsylvania does not define what the President has power to do. If it is to be assumed that the President already has all the power that the case admits of, perhaps that remedy is ample; but on that ground the whole bill is a simple declaration of what ought to be done without any remedy for doing it; and if there is nothing more than what is absolutely granted by the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania I submit that this bill is nothing but a declaration of American principles with regard to the American citizen abroad, and with that you ought to be content, and the first and second sections are all that ought to be passed; nobody will contend that the third section arms the President with a particle of additional power, and for that reason I should be content with the first and second sections rather than make an empty sounding declaration, which upon examination amounts to nothing and gives no additional authority.

The next proposition which has fallen under my notice is that of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY.] Agreeing with the bill in the principles I have mentioned, he provides a remedy. What is it? If any of the rights of the citizen abroad—I am now assuming that it is the naturalized citizen resident abroad—are infringed the President shall extend protection. What protection? In what way? By any necessary means in accordance with the principles of international law. Well, that comes out exactly where it went in. That ends just where it begins. That makes no advance. Nobody will pretend it. That gives no remedy. That invests the President with no additional authority or power. It is not even an emphatic instruction on the subject. The bill, then, as it would stand amended by the honorable Senator from Connecticut, is a high sounding declaration of the American doctrine of the right of expatriation and the right of absolute protection to the naturalized citizen, a declaration that the flag covers him, that his rights are as sacred as if he were born on this soil; but when you come to the question of remedy, not a word; not a word in advance; turn him over to the principles of international law. That is all.

What I mean to say, Mr. President, is that the bill stopping there proposes no remedy, invests the President with no authority, is no rule of conduct for him in such a case; and for that reason it strikes me if you are to have a remedy it is inadequate altogether.

The next proposition is that of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD.] That does propose a remedy, but I think it is a remedy, perhaps, a little too belligerent; I think it is a remedy which might involve difficulty, and for that reason, without stopping to comment upon it, I would say that if it should come to the knowledge of the President that the rights of a naturalized citizen had been discriminated against it would hardly be worth while to authorize the President thereupon, in such a case, without further consideration, to withdraw all diplomatic relations whatever. It might be construed into an act of war. For that reason I would hardly think that judicious.

And now, Mr. President, one word briefly upon the proposition of the honorable Senator from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and then I have done. The Senator from Oregon, accepting the propositions in the first and second sections of the bill, provides a remedy, and what is it? He says that whenever the President knows of any case of injustice he shall act. Well, sir, what would be a case of injustice? Whenever it comes to the knowledge of the President that any foreign Government has denied to a naturalized citizen the right of expatriation, and whenever such citizen has fallen under the ban of such Government, and his rights on that ground are discriminated against, that shall be regarded as an act of positive injustice toward that American citizen. That is the ground, and that is in exact harmony with the bill. Those who accept the two propositions in the first and second sections of the bill certainly cannot deny that proposition. In such a case of injustice what is to be done? The remedy is this: if it appears to the President that such acts have been done in violation of those rights thus set forth it shall be the duty of the President immediately to demand the reasons. Is there any objection to that? Can any Senator say that that of itself would endanger the peace of the nation? Can you do less? If you say that the rights of a naturalized citizen shall not be discriminated against, and it comes to the knowledge of the President that an injustice has been done in that regard, will you not say that it is his duty at once to inquire into the facts and to address himself to that Government thus committing that injustice and demand the reasons? Nobody would object to that, of course. Suppose the reasons are given and the reasons are not satisfactory, what then? Then this amendment provides that he shall use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as are within his power, and that is all there is of it. Whether the honorable Senator from Oregon thinks this is ample or not I do not know. What I am saying is that he does provide for some specific remedy to the end that at least by making it the duty of the President to demand the reasons for the discrimination between the naturalized and the native citizen he will have a case, he will be able to present to the Congress of the United States and the American people the case which arises in the premises, and we shall know the reasons for the discrimination; but what then? If the remedy is obvious to the President he may take it, provided that he does not involve the nation in any war, that he does not commit an act of war; and further, the amendment provides that in any of these cases and in all cases it shall be his duty to report the result of his investigations to the Congress of the United States.

I only intended to glance at the different propositions; and at this late period I am not disposed to delay the action of the Senate. I merely say that I shall vote against the proposition of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, and I shall vote with a view of getting in the Senate at the proposition of the honorable Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HARLAN. I am very anxious to get the attention of the Senate to a bill pertaining to the District of Columbia; but as I do not wish to interfere with a vote on this bill, I will venture to express the hope that a vote may be taken.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FERRY.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Conkling, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, McGreevy, Morrill of Vermont, Pomeroy, Ross, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers, and Welch—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Gragin, Drake, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Rice, Robertson, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Pool, Saulsbury, and Whyte—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire a separate vote on the amendment proposed in committee by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the Senate with the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The Senator from Maine desires a separate vote on the amendment mentioned by him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to substitute the amendment that I proposed in Committee of the Whole for the amendment made on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, or for the section as amended, and I wish to say a very few words. I shall not take five minutes.

The section as it now stands is inconsistent with itself, for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania requires the President to exercise all his powers under the Constitution, and as amended by the Senator from Michigan it only allows him to exercise one specific power; so that while the section apparently requires him to do everything, it is so modified as to require him to do but one thing. Then I wish to suggest that the suspension of diplomatic relations would be no remedy as to those nations with which we have no diplomatic relations. There are many nations in the world with whom we have no diplomatic relations. There are the barbarous Powers, for instance. If an American citizen is seized by a barbarous Power what remedy would this be? The President ought to have the power to do what the exigencies of the case require to rescue that citizen from imprisonment, and this amendment of mine enables the President to exercise his power without involving the country in war.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It seems to be the determination of the Senate to waste the little time we have left—I believe there are but two days—in discussing this matter which has already taken about three days, and I feel therefore inclined to say a few words on it as I am a member of the committee that reported the bill.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Before the Senator proceeds the Chair desires to state the question. It appears that the Senator from Oregon proposes to amend the same section that the Senator from Maine proposes to disagree to, and the first question will be on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to strike out that portion of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to which he objects, and then the motion of the Senator from Oregon will be in order.

MR. HOWARD. I desire to modify the amendment which I presented before, so as to leave it discretionary with the President to recall the representative from a foreign Government.

MR. FESSENDEN. I have the same objection to that. As the bill stood amended by the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania I had no objection to it. It was then substantially a legislative declaration that all citizens, whether native or adopted, should stand upon the same level, and that it should be the duty of our Government to protect them alike in all places and under all circumstances; that is just as far as I think we are entitled to go; and it further provided that in case negotiation should fail in point of fact resort should then be had to Congress by a statement of the facts. If it should be a question of that severity as in the judgment of the President of the United States to need the interposition of Congress, then that interposition was to be appealed to.

Now, sir, my objection to legislating in the manner proposed by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Michigan is that it assumes to do what Congress in the nature of things ought not to assume to do, in my judgment. There are certain things that belong to the executive power. There are certain other things that belong to the legislative power. It is impossible in the nature of things for Congress to foresee what should be done, particularly in any one case, and yet this amendment moved by the honorable Senator from Michigan proposes to designate precisely what course shall be adopted in advance, before we know what the case is, and before we know what difficulties may surround it, and before we know what may be the consequences of the act that we render mandatory upon the President. We gain nothing by anything of that description.

Gentlemen talk about the necessity of pointing out this matter to the President and dictating the course. Let me ask Senators if it is possible to believe that we shall have an Administration in this country dependent upon the will of the people, and desirous to keep the good will of the people, that will not do all that it can do with reference to the protection of our citizens abroad, whether native or adopted. It is a question of national honor which no Administration dares to trifle with. Everything will be done unquestionably that can be done. I believe everything has been done by this Administration, and I believe that the Secretary of State has in fact gone further than he had any authority to go in employing counsel to defend men who were in difficulty abroad; but let that pass.

What I say, then, is that I do not apprehend the slightest danger of any omission of duty on the part of any Administration that we shall ever have in this country so long as that Administration is elected. They will do it from the necessity of keeping the good will of the large mass of the people. And yet, sir, we here undertake by legislation to point out to the executive Government, which, from the nature of things, is and ought to be intrusted with all these matters of diplomatic relations and all negotiations with foreign Governments, precisely what they shall do in a given case which we know nothing about, and which may be surrounded by circumstances that we cannot foresee. Sir, in my judgment it is the most unwise thing in the world. In my belief it was never before attempted in any Government on the face of the earth to legislate as to what should be done in a given case in its foreign relations by that department of the Government to which are intrusted the foreign relations of the country, and we ought not to interfere with it. I say, therefore, that, in my judgment, the adoption of that amendment only tends to make us ridiculous in undertaking to foresee what we cannot, and to point out a course of action under circumstances about which we can know nothing in advance.

That is my objection to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. I infinitely prefer to that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon, because it does not attempt to designate what shall be done; but better than either, in my judgment, and in fact comprising all there is of value in the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, is the amendment that was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. It covers the whole ground in proper language and in appropriate words. It points out that it is the will of Congress that the executive Government shall take all proper steps in all such cases, a thing unnecessary in itself, but if we are going to do anything it amounts to nothing more than that; and it ought not to amount to anything more than that, because it is a matter upon which, as I said before, we cannot properly undertake to determine what particular thing shall be done.

Sir, you must have some confidence in your Government, and leave the executive part of it to its appropriate sphere. I know we have a right to pass laws; but in all such cases, in my judgment, the passage of laws undertaking to interfere with that which is appropriate to another department of the Government is injurious, and must necessarily be so.

MR. PRESIDENT, as I said before, we can do nothing but declare the principle; and if the Government does not do its duty the people will remedy it, and we must leave the proper remedy to those who have it in their hands. I do not believe that any good is to come of the kind of interference we propose. Where does this bill come from? We cannot, in the nature of things, find a remedy for it. My colleague was perfectly right in criticising the remedies; he only did not go quite far enough. He should have said that in the nature of things no remedy could be found.

MR. MORKILL, of Maine. Unless you intend to provide a remedy, there should be no bill.

MR. FESSENDEN. What has experience taught us in respect to this very bill? It came from the House of Representatives with one remedy. We repudiated it. All the study the House of Representatives and their Committee on Foreign Affairs could give us was a resort to reprisals, and that was rejected at once unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Relations on the part of the Senate, and almost unanimously, if not quite so, by the Senate itself. There was a remedy, and we abandoned that. Now, gentlemen are finding some other remedies. We have had some half dozen of them, and they all amount to nothing except this: that we declare the principle we adopt in regard to it, and what is the duty of the Government, unless that of the honorable Senator from Michigan, which is more definite, but which is objectionable for the reason I have stated, that it undertakes to cure a case that it does not know anything about. There is the difficulty. After we have tried all these things, and found these differences of opinion, why should we not leave the bill as it was left on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania? It stood well there, and I think we had better stand upon that still.

MR. ANTHONY. I rise to make a suggestion in regard to the order of business. There are a number of executive nominations before us that ought to be referred to the appropriate committees, and if we could go into executive session for about ten minutes and make those references before the recess it would expedite the transaction of business. I do not wish to interfere with this bill if my friend from California thinks he can get a vote.

MR. CONNESS. I think we are near a vote now, and if we go into executive session at this time we shall not have a legislative session again before the recess. I hope we shall be allowed to go on with this bill for a few minutes, and I think we can get a vote.

MR. ANTHONY. Then I shall postpone my motion for a few minutes longer; but if the Chair will give me the floor I shall certainly make the motion again before the recess.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair gives the floor to those who speak for it first.

MR. ANTHONY. I speak for it now. [Laughter.]

MR. HOWARD. I wish to inquire whether the amendment offered by me in Committee of the Whole is now amendable in the Senate?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion was to concur in the Senate with the amendments made in committee. The Senator from Maine excepted the amendment to the third section, and his motion, if properly put, is to strike out that portion of the section which was inserted on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

MR. HOWARD. I wish to make a small amendment to the amendment which I offered, so that it shall leave it discretionary with the President whether to recall our minister from the foreign Government or not.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be modified if there be no objection.

MR. HOWARD. I suppose by common consent it can be amended.

MR. FESSENDEN. I object to the modification unless the Senator modifies the other part of it also, so as not to make it imperative on the President of the United States to suspend negotiations with the minister of any foreign Government here.

MR. HOWARD. The truth is, that the amendment as it now stands does not express the idea which I had originally. In making a slight modification at the Clerk's desk I omitted to use such phraseology as would carry out my exact idea. I wish to have my amendment come fairly before the Senate, and therefore ask that it may be modified so as to read in this way: "That the President of the United States may withdraw," &c., and in the second clause to say that he shall discontinue correspondence with the resident minister of that country here.

MR. HARLAN. I am not sure that I understood the Chair. Did the Chair rule that an amendment made in committee was not amendable in the Senate?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question was on concurring in the Senate with the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Maine excepted this particular amendment, and the Senator from Maine now proposes to concur with the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with an amendment, which is to strike out the portion of the third section that was inserted on the motion of the Senator from Michigan. It is in order to concur with an amendment; it is in order to concur without amendment; or, it is in order not to concur at all.

MR. HARLAN. When the question shall be taken on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan, I suppose it will be in order to amend it as that Senator now proposes.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Certainly it will. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to strike out that portion of section three which was inserted on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

MR. FESSENDEN. I understand the question to be whether the Senate will concur with that amendment.

MR. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will allow me to modify it.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It appears that the whole of section three as it now stands is an amendment, a part of it was inserted on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania and a part of it on the motion of the Senator from Michigan, and both those amendments now constitute one section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I move to strike out that part which was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves to amend the section by striking out that portion of it which was inserted on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONNESS. Let the Clerk read the section and the words to be stricken out, and let us vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The third section, as amended in Committee of the Whole, reads as follows:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President to exert all his powers under the Constitution and laws for the protection and relief of citizens of the United States abroad, and to report promptly to Congress from time to time all cases where justice or relief shall be refused to such citizens by the Government of any foreign country. And whenever any citizen of the United States shall be or shall have been unlawfully arrested or unlawfully detained by any foreign Government it shall be the duty of the President on receiving information thereof to demand the release and liberation of such citizen; and in case of the refusal or unreasonable delay of such foreign Government to release such citizen, it shall be the duty of the President to withdraw the diplomatic representative of the United States from such foreign Government and to refuse to hold further diplomatic correspondence with any representative of such foreign Government until justice shall be done in the matter by such Government.

The Senator from Maine moves to strike out the latter clause, beginning with the words "and whenever."

Mr. HOWARD. I trust the Senate will allow me to modify the clause by making it read, "the President may withdraw the diplomatic representative of the United States from such foreign Government, and shall hold no further diplomatic correspondence with any representative of such foreign Government," &c. It expresses my idea better.

Mr. ANTHONY. The last clause is made mandatory.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, and the first discretionary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified unless objection be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SUMNER. I would remark, on the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, that the first part of it is already implied in the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, which has been adopted; and the second part, so far as it is mandatory, I think might be very inconvenient in the conduct of our foreign relations. It certainly carries into detail in advance instructions which I do not think it expedient for Congress to enter upon. I think it will be enough for us to declare, as we do in the first and second sections of the bill, the general principles, and be as abstemious as possible with regard to those details which may be necessary in their application. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will be rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. In the amendment proposed by him he uses the word "unlawful." In judging whether the arrest and confinement are unlawful will that be decided by the laws of this country or by the laws of the country where the arrest is made? If an arrest should be unjust and oppressive, and yet be according to the finding of some grand jury or other proceeding in court, would it be unlawful in the sense in which the Senator uses the word?

Mr. HOWARD. I suppose that the only practical construction to be given to that word "unlawful" would be this: that the arrest and detention must be contrary to the laws of nations, contrary to the rights of an American citizen under the laws of nations. That is the construction which I give to it, and the idea which I had in my mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, to strike from the third section that portion which was added to it in committee on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HOWARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conkling, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harris, McCreery, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Vickers and Willey—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Cole, Conness, Corbett, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Wade, Welch, Williams, Wilson and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Cameron, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Morton, Norton, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Saulsbury and White—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move now to strike out the third section and substitute the proposition that I offered in committee.

Mr. CONNESS. Now let that be read.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

That whenever it shall be made known to the President that any citizen of the United States has been unjustly deprived of his liberty by or under the authority of any foreign Government, it shall be the duty of the President forthwith to demand of that Government the reasons for such imprisonment, and if it appears to be wrongful and in violation of the rights of American citizenship, the President shall forthwith demand the release of such citizen; and if the release so demanded is unreasonably delayed or refused, it shall be the duty of the President to use such means, not amounting to acts of war, as he may think necessary and proper to obtain or effectuate such release; and all the facts and proceedings relative thereto shall, as soon as practicable, be communicated by the President of the United States to Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Cameron, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Kellogg, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Welch, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Howard, Howe, Nye, Rice, Sumner, and Van Winkle—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Bayard, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, McDonald, Morton, Norton, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sawyer, Trumbull, and Whyte—17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as it has been amended on the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I cannot vote for the principle embodied in that amendment. I am very well satisfied with that portion of it which requires the President of the United States in such cases to make demand on the foreign Government for an explanation and for the release of the person restrained of his liberty; but I am not willing to place in the hands of the President of the United States that broad and almost illimitable discretion which the Senator from Oregon gives to him by this amendment. The President of the United States is authorized by the amendment to use any means not amounting to acts of war—I believe I repeat the language correctly—which he may see fit in order to effectuate the object. Now, sir, what are some of the means not amounting to acts of war? This enables the President of the United States to put an end to all intercourse between the people of the United States and the foreign Government. That is not an act of war. It authorizes the President to make reprisals on the persons and property of the offending Government for the purpose of righting the wrongs complained of. Strictly and technically speaking reprisals are not acts of war; but, as we know very well, both the stoppage of commercial relations and the exercise of the right of reprisals almost always lead to actual war.

I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate on this subject; but the Senate will see if they scan this amendment that it opens discretion widely, entirely too widely, I think, to the President of the United States. It enables him substantially and practically to involve this country in a war with a foreign nation at his own discretion by ordering the cessation of commercial intercourse or by ordering reprisals, neither of which technically and legally speaking amounts to an act of war according to the code of war and according to the laws of nations. Now, sir, I will never consent to give the President this broad and dangerous discretion. The Constitution of our country commits to Congress entirely the war-making power; and the President of the United States has no more to do with it than has the humblest magistrate in the country, without an act of Congress. I shall therefore vote against the bill if this clause is insisted upon. We are in the habit of giving too much discretion to the President. I would be glad to narrow it down, to keep the Executive of this nation within the boundaries fixed by the Constitution, and as they were understood to be fixed by the fathers of the Republic. I will not enable the President to launch a war upon this country without consulting Congress. If you pass this amendment you enable him to involve this country in war without any appeal or reference to ourselves sitting here in the two Houses. That is the long and the short of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not believe that the President will have any more power under this amendment to involve the nation in war than he has at this time. Assuming that the President is a dishonest, unfaithful, unwise Chief Magistrate, he can involve this nation in war to-morrow or at any other time. He possesses ample power to involve the nation in war. If you propose any remedy at all, you must invest the Executive with some discretion, so that he may apply the remedy to a case as it may arise. As to England or France he might adopt one policy to relieve a citizen imprisoned by either one of those countries; as to the Barbary Powers, he might adopt another policy; as to the islands of the ocean, another. With different countries that have different systems of government he might adopt different means. But, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts read law the other day to show that the acts which the Senator from Michigan has designated would be acts of war; and this amendment was changed so as to avoid any objection of that kind which the Senator has made against it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the trouble about this whole subject is, in my opinion, that we are trying to do what is impossible to be done. If a citizen of this country is maltreated by another nation there is but one remedy, and that is to compel that nation to respect the rights of our citizens, and that means war; just exactly the same remedy that England took toward Abyssinia. It is war. Now, the bill contains in my opinion all that is necessary. Everybody who is familiar with the history of the question knows that the difficulty in reference to the rights of American citizens abroad has been that our own jurists laid down the doctrine that citizens of other countries had not the right of expatriation; and whenever any negotiation transpired between our nation and another nation they right away quoted to us our own authorities.

I have here before me Story, where the doctrine is broadly stated that the right of expatriation does not exist; that a nation has a right to control its native-born citizens. Now, what do we do by this bill? We negative all these declarations of our jurists and say that the right of expatriation does exist and will be insisted upon by this country. Having done that, we probably have the remedy; and if that is not the remedy the next step is to enforce that doctrine of the right of expatriation, not by withdrawing your representative, not by hard words, but by hard blows; and it is the only way that the right of expatriation can be enforced. Therefore I shall vote to strike out this third section.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I also shall vote to strike out this section. It seems to me it is out of place here. We shall do our duty if we, as we do in the first and second sections, declare the rule of law applicable to immigrants coming to this country; in other words, if we vindicate according to the language of this bill the right of expatriation. That is the real point in issue; there is no other point; and as the Senator from New Jersey has reminded us, on that point our own greatest jurists have concurred with the English authorities. He quoted Story. I might also quote Kent. I have his words here on my table. I might quote Ellsworth, one of our earliest chief justices. I might quote Washington, a very able judge of our Supreme Court, who said that he must be wiser than he was at that time if he undertook to declare that any man could release himself from his obligations to his country without the consent of that country.

Now, as I understand it, this bill does meet precisely the difficulties raised by these various expressions of opinion from high authorities in our courts. Why not stop there? Why go beyond that into debatable ground? Why undertake to give remedies which the case does not require, and, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] says, does not admit of. I accept his amendment; it does not admit of the remedy proposed. The remedies are out of place. They are inapplicable. The panacea does not apply. I know the Senator from Oregon does not see it so; and when I know how excellent he is as a lawyer I am led for the moment to hesitate in my own conclusions; but still, after the best reflection I have been able to give this question, the Senator must pardon me if I do say that his amendment is entirely inappropriate. Besides, when I look at it I see that it does undertake to give powers to the President which are not defined. It says all powers except acts of war. Very well; we have had a learned discussion in the course of this debate on that subject, and Senators in my eye, particularly one very determined Senator, have insisted that reprisals, with all their barbarism, were not acts of war, but were acts of peace. Under the interpretation which has been given to acts of war on this floor the President would be justified in launching that barbarism and disgracing the country and the age. The Senator shakes his head. I simply speak according to the fact, and his language is susceptible of such an interpretation. It does open the door to such an abomination.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the time for taking the recess be extended twenty minutes, and that at five o'clock the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. That is a double motion. Several Senators. Let us vote.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will give way for a vote, but I fear we are not going to have a vote.

Mr. SUMNER. Does the recess occur at five o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. We cannot reach a vote by that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I make the motion that the recess be extended for twenty minutes, and that at five o'clock we proceed to the consideration of executive business. We can refer the nominations on the table, and that will make one day's difference in the progress of business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think we shall save time by going on to the conclusion of this discussion. Every time the bill is taken up the discussion must necessarily spring up anew, and we shall save time if we go on now until it is concluded. I am in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island that the time for taking a recess be extended.

Mr. ANTHONY. If Senators want to come back here for an executive session next week I shall interpose no further objection. I give it up. I have been trying all day to get an executive session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from New Jersey has given the debate an entirely new turn, and that is that the bill is utterly unauthorized on the American principle, or on the doctrine of international law; that is to say the doctrine of expatriation is not sound.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate, and which has been received by unanimous consent, is the motion that the time for taking the recess be extended twenty minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is not my motion. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I objected to that in my seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to correct my friend from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] I certainly hold the very opposite opinion to that which he ascribes to me. My statement was that the jurists of this country had held that expatriation was not a right, and we hold the contrary doctrine, and asserted it by this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the time for the recess will not be extended. As to the executive business, we can just as well go into executive session and refer the nominations on the table to-night as do it now.

Mr. ANTHONY. This evening is assigned for special business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose it is, we can overrule that assignment. Three days ago fifteen minutes were assigned to close this bill, and we have been on it ever since, day and night.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. And this morning the understanding was that we should have a vote without debate.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senators will let us vote now we can vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why did not the Senator think of that some time ago when he was making a speech himself?

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Maine has occupied as much time as I have to-day on this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is very much mistaken.

Mr. CONNESS. I was for passing the bill and the Senator against it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; I was in hopes we should have come to a conclusion on it a long time ago.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I yielded the floor to an explanation of my friend from New Jersey.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But my colleague yielded the floor, and this question is a debatable question, and I choose to debate it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will not contest my colleague's right to the floor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The question is debatable. We cannot take this vote before five o'clock.

Mr. CONNESS. We will vote if the Senator will take his seat. There is time enough to call the roll. That is all there is to be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I yield, then, to let the vote be taken. What is the question upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon concurring in the Senate in the amendment made to the bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the time for taking the recess be extended for twenty minutes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have sat here all day in the hope that this bill would be disposed of in some way, but it seems impossible to get rid of it.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us vote.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will make a motion on which the Senator can vote. I move that this bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONKLING. What has become of the motion in regard to the recess?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the vote on my motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The motion is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If it is objected to it is out of order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I move to postpone the bill before the Senate for the purpose of enabling me to make the motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The motion to lie on the table has precedence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to lie on the table takes precedence of all other motions.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves that the bill lie on the table. Upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CONKLING. At what time does the recess occur?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At five o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. It is five o'clock now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The call of the roll was commenced.

Mr. FESSENDEN, (when his name was called.) I do not vote; the time for the recess has arrived; it is now past five o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the roll must not be interrupted.

The call of the roll was concluded; and the result announced—yeas 4, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Howard, Morrill of Vermont, Ross and Van Winkle—4.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, McCreery, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Rice, Sawyer, Sprague, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Yates—37.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Howe, Kellogg, Morton, Norton, Pool, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Welch, Whyte, and Wilson—23.

So the Senate refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order of the Senate, a recess will now be taken until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill (H. R. No. 1235) to further amend the postal laws, having met after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to said bill, with the following amendments: section thirteen, line five, strike out all after "whatever;" at the end of section fourteen add "all other blank agencies are hereby abolished."

ALEXANDER RAMSEY,

JAMES HARLAN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. F. FARNSWORTH,

JOHN HILL,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

DISTRICT CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 541) making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution; and

On motion by Mr. MORRILL, of Maine,

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. PATTERSON of New Hampshire, and Mr. McDONALD.

MARK HOWARD.

Mr. FERRY. I request the Senator from West Virginia, to whose Committee on Pensions this evening has been assigned, to allow me to call up a bill reported by him from the Committee on Finance, House bill No. 39, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to adjust the accounts of Mark Howard. It will take but a moment.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If it will give rise to no discussion I shall not object.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 39) authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to adjust the accounts of Mark Howard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to adjust and settle the accounts of Mark Howard as collector of the first revenue district of Connecticut, in conformity with the revenue laws in force at the time he was collector of the district.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from West Virginia reported the bill from the Committee on Finance, and can explain it if an explanation is necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON CITY LOAN.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 637.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I must object.

Mr. HARLAN. It is a bill to authorize the city of Washington to borrow money to pay its debts.

Mr. MORGAN. Will it create debate?

Mr. HARLAN. I think not, and it is very important that it should be passed. I may state in one word that the city owes now about two hundred thousand dollars to its school teachers and for school-house purposes, and it is very important that the bill should be passed in order that they may raise money to pay these debts.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Under the bill the city of Washington is to issue, by vote of its councils, registered or coupon bonds in denominations of $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, payable in ten years from the date of issue, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, principal and interest payable in lawful money of the United States. The bonds are to be signed by the mayor and countersigned by the register of the city, and to be payable at such place or places as may by them be deemed expedient, and may be issued and disposed of to an amount sufficient to pay and discharge the present floating debt of the city, not, however, to exceed the sum of $800,000. The bonds are not to be sold for less than their par value in lawful money of the United States, or in exchange for matured and liquidated indebtedness; but no greater amount of bonds are to be disposed of than may be found necessary for the payment of said indebtedness. The city councils upon issuing the bonds herein authorized are to provide by taxation for the prompt payment of the interest thereon; also to provide for their redemption by establishing a sinking fund to be set apart annually to an amount not exceeding ten per cent. of the amount of bonds issued, the sinking fund to be created from regular taxes levied for that purpose, and to be assessed and collected as other taxes.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANDREW S. CORE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Finance, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 172) to construe an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core," and asked for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was read three times, and passed. It proposes to construe the act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core, so as to direct the accounting officers to settle and close the accounts by crediting Core with the amount of such uncollectable and unaccounted-for tax lists or bills placed in his hands for collection as they may be satisfied have been lost or destroyed by reason of rebel raids, and have not been collected by him.

CALIFORNIA LAND CLAIMS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1206. I presume it will excite no discussion. It is a very important bill, and there are many people interested in it. It has been very carefully considered by the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1206) to restore to certain parties their rights under laws and treaties of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that each and every person claiming lands in California by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican authorities, and whose claim has not been adjudicated by the commission created by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1851, and record evidence of which claim is found in the Spanish or Mexican archives, now in the custody of the United States surveyor general for the State of California, shall, within one year after the date of the act, present his petition in writing for the same to the United States district court for the district in which the land claimed is situated, with such documentary evidence and testimony of witnesses as the claimant relies upon in support of his claim; and thereupon the same proceedings are to be had in the district court in relation to the hearing and decision of the claim in all respects as though it had been presented to and decided adverse to such claim by the commission created by the act of March 3, 1851, except that no transcript of the report or proceedings of the commission shall be presented to the district court, and the survey of any grant which may be confirmed under this act shall be subject to the provisions of the act of June 14, 1860. From the decision of the district courts, both on the title and on the survey and location, an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States within six months after such decision has been rendered, and the same proceedings for the hearing and decision thereof shall be had, and the judgment of the district court shall have the same effect as is provided by the acts hereinbefore referred to. All persons who, previous to the passage of this act, have acquired any valid right or title to any of the lands embraced within its provisions under the preemption or homestead laws or otherwise are to be protected in their rights.

The Committee on Private Land Claims proposed to amend the bill by striking out the following clause:

That all persons who, previous to the passage of this act, have acquired any valid right or title to any of the lands embraced within the provisions of this act under the preemption or homestead laws or otherwise shall be protected in their rights.

And in lieu thereof inserting:

That a decree under the provisions of this act in favor of any claim derived from Mexican or Spanish authorities shall not be construed to affect or in any way impair any adverse right, title, or claim under the laws of the United States or the laws of California but for the area embraced within the decree to which the adverse right, title or claim attaches; the claimant or his assigns may select and shall be allowed to enter any other lands not mineral belonging to the United States, and subject to entry at private sale, which selections shall be of sections or legal subdivisions of sections at the option of the parties entitled to make them.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to the amendment, but if I understand the bill it opens up the whole question of Spanish claims in California. I do not think such a bill as that ought to go through in this way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator is mistaken. It only provides for cases where the record evidence of the title is now in the office of the surveyor general in California. It allows no title to be established by parol or anything of the kind; but where the title is perfect upon the records in the surveyor general's office in California in such cases suits can be brought. There are only two or three cases, I think, and the circumstances were such, according to the law in force in California, that they could not be brought before the courts. It is only to such cases that this bill applies.

Mr. HARLAN. If there are only two or three cases, I think it would be better to let each case come up on its own merits. No one can foresee the cases that will arise under this bill unless he has examined the whole record. We all know that in California vast quantities of the best agricultural lands in the State have been swept away from the settlers and have gone to the possession of persons that paid nothing whatever for them to any Government, either the Mexican Government or ours, and I doubt very much the propriety of a bill like this. I call the attention of the Senate to it. Of course I have no personal interest in it.

Mr. CONNESS. A few words, I think, will be sufficient in regard to this bill. As the Senator from Oregon says, it only applies to two or three cases at the outside. Those are cases in which the record evidence is complete. Special bills have been attempted to be passed for the last five years since I have been in the Senate, and I have hindered their passage because the parties attempting to pass them would do nothing to protect the settlers on the lands. They are fully protected here, the parties finally agreeing to that. Until these questions are adjudicated and settled their claims act as a cloud upon the title, and there is no peace for the possessors, even where they acquired title from the United States, and this is to remove that cloud. It cannot possibly lead to any difficulty, but, on the contrary, to great advantage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Iowa will see that this bill provides that the right of any person in possession of lands under the laws of the United States or the laws of California shall in no way be affected or impaired by any proceedings under this act. It abundantly protects every settler, and is rather intended to quiet titles. There are important tracts of land to which there is a claim pending, and that claim is a cloud on the titles of men who own the property. If it can be adjudicated in court and settled that doubt will be removed.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not object to the amendment. I think that is obviously right, whether the bill passes or not. Let the question be taken on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. Now I will ask that the first section of the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read the first section of the bill.

Mr. HARLAN. That looks to me as if it opened up the whole question again.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but what this is entirely right. I see what it does; it revives those cases that are now excluded by law, allows those to come into court who did not avail themselves of the commission during the time the commission was in existence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true. There is no time now to explain; but there are cases where it was impossible on account of circumstances for the claimants to present their cases to the board of commissioners within the time limited by law.

Mr. POMEROY. While it may relieve some very worthy ones, I am afraid it will relieve many unworthy ones.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is impossible that it can do so. If a man has record evidence of his title that right under the treaty ought to be recognized by the American Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I could explain if I had time. Take, for instance, one case where there were contending claims to a tract of land. Both claims were presented to the board of commissioners. The commissioners decided in favor of one claim, and the district court affirmed that decision. In view of that the other claim was withdrawn from the board. That decision was then taken up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and finally reversed, and the Supreme Court decided that the claim which had been recognized by the board of land commissioners was an invalid claim. By that time the statute of limitations had run, so that the man who had a good claim could not come in with it, and for that reason he is left out when there is no doubt that he has a good claim to the land, but he had no opportunity under these circumstances to present his case.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not care to argue it. I am afraid of it, that is all.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I am afraid this will lead to discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I think we can vote now.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If there can be a vote I shall not interpose.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator from Oregon whether there was not a commission to settle these Spanish claims, and whether the period within which the claims could be made has not expired; and is not this now to extend the time within which claims may be presented to the commission?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true; it extends the time one year.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May not rights have been acquired since that limitation expired which this bill does not respect?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at all. The Senator will see that it is provided in this bill that no proceedings under it shall affect or in any way impair the right of any person in possession of any property under the laws of the United States or the laws of California, so that if any man is in possession of property there under any law of the United States or law of California he is protected by the terms of this bill; but there are claims set up in such cases which are a cloud upon the title of men in possession, and it is desirable that they should be determined by litigation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator whether the law did not provide that those lands which were not claimed within the time limited should become public lands of the United States, and whether this bill does not authorize private claimants to come in and take them, not as public lands, but in their own right?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true. The law organizing the board of commissioners provided that such lands as were not claimed should revert to the public domain and be a part of the public lands. These lands have been taken, a portion of them as public domain, and the persons who have so taken them are protected by this bill. The claimants can establish their right to the quantity of land granted to them, and the bill provides that the amount which they establish to belong to them may be taken from vacant public lands elsewhere.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not think this bill ought to pass. In the first place, very few of the holders of any of these claims ever paid anything for them. They applied to the Spanish authorities for a cattle rancho and made arrangements that they should have all the land between the limits of certain mountains or rivers. It is not a case of settling title to land that anybody has given a consideration for, as we understand that word. A number of years were given to all these claimants under the treaty with Mexico, to come in and establish their claims. That time has long since elapsed, and this bill opens up the whole question. I do not think it ought to be passed. I hope it will not be insisted on.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I feel constrained to move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed in order to take up House bill No. 1431. I could have had twenty pension bills passed while this bill has been under consideration.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not understand why this bill should not pass. If the Senators understood it as the committee who have fully investigated it understand it, they would not object to it. I will state a case to which it applies. It applies to the land covered by the city of Petaluma, but since I have been here I have hindered the passage of an act to establish that claim. There is scarcely a doubt of the complete record evidence of the claim. We have bound ourselves by treaty to protect these persons in that property; but they are out of court, it may be said, by their own neglect. In many instances, however, these parties did not understand our language, and labored under great difficulties indeed. It was only last year that we confirmed a claim outright by act of Congress that it is as well established as the title to the property that any Senator owns, and yet it never got into the board of land commissioners. In this case this hangs as a cloud over the whole city property. The parties will get into court at some time or other. If this act passes, the United States having received pay for that property loses nothing by it; the parties take land, if they establish their claim, that is of far less value. I hope we shall get a vote upon the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I dislike very much to interpose any objection—

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I must move to lay this bill on the table, in order that pension bills may be taken up. I consented to allow it to be taken up with the understanding that it would lead to no discussion, but it has led to a very lengthy one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield the floor for the motion?

Mr. CONKLING. I was going to make a suggestion, and I hoped the Senator from California would obviate the objection.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will ask me any question I will answer it. I hope gentlemen will give us a vote on this bill. I am sure it has been examined by one of the best committees of this body, and one in which the Senate ought to have confidence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think a bill of this importance ought to be passed upon with so few present and such little explanation. The Senator from California does not pay any very great attention or respect to the reports of committees unless they are in his favor. He has not thought much of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the bill that has been discussed so long. I am disposed at any rate to understand something more about this before we act.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I insist on my motion to postpone the consideration of this bill and take up the pension bills.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COOLIE TRADE.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1431.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a report which I was not able to make this morning.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill (S. No. 644) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coolie trade by American citizens in American vessels," approved February 19, 1862; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SUMNER. The effect of the bill is simply to extend the existing acts against the trade in Chinese coolies to the trade in Japanese coolies, and I hope the Senate will put it on its passage.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. It will not take time.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. After I get through you can go on. I insist on my motion.

EMMELENE H. RUDD.

Mr. VAN WINKLE's motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1431) granting a pension to Emmelene H. Rudd, widow of the late Commodore John Rudd, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Emmelene H. Rudd, widow of John Rudd, late a commodore in the United States Navy, and to pay her, out of the naval pension fund, a pension at the rate of thirty dollars per month, commencing October 12, 1867, to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REBECCA C. MEEKER.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 597.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 597) granting a pension to Rebecca C. Meeker was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. By its terms the Secretary of the Interior is to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Rebecca C. Meeker, widow of Captain James F. Meeker, of the war of 1812, and allow and pay her a pension at the rate of twenty dollars per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY SCOTT.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 598.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 598) for the relief of Mary Scott was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to allow and pay to Mary Scott, widow of William Scott, late a private in company I, fifteenth regiment Massachusetts volunteers, a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, from the 21st of October, 1861, the date of the death of her husband, until the 10th of August, 1866, the date of the commencement of the pension heretofore allowed her, and the additional sum of two dollars per month for each child of William Scott under sixteen years of age, to commence from the 25th day of July, 1866, and to continue until the children shall severally attain the age of sixteen years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID DUHIGG.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 218.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 218) granting a pension of seventeen dollars per month to David Duhigg, of Lyndon, Vermont, father of late first lieutenant Dennis Duhigg, of company M, first regiment Vermont artillery, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of David Duhigg, father of late first lieutenant Dennis Duhigg, of company M, first regiment Vermont artillery, who was killed in battle, and David Duhigg, in consequence of the service and death of his son, is to be paid during his natural life a pension of seventeen dollars per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE TRUAX.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 256.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 256) granting a pension to George Truax, late a private in company H, first regiment of Virginia volunteers, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing the name of George Truax, late a private in company H, first regiment of Virginia volunteers, on the pension-roll, to be paid a pension to the extent of one fourth disability, to be increased or cease as the subsequent examinations of the surgeon may disclose, subject to the rules and regulations of the pension department, to commence on the 29th day of October A. D. 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET DAVIS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1164.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1164) granting a pension to Margaret Davis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret Davis, widow of William H. Davis, late an acting surgeon in the eighteenth Missouri volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of seventeen dollars per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH CASSIDY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1165.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1165) granting a pension to Elizabeth Cassidy was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Cassidy, widow of Michael Cassidy, late a first lieutenant in the sixty-ninth regiment of Pennsylvania volunteer infantry, commencing July 5, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUISA M. WILLISTON.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1166.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1166) granting a pension to Louisa M. Williston. The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place on the pension-roll the name of Louisa M. Williston, widow of Samuel P. Williston, late a sergeant in the fourth Massachusetts battery, and pay her a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, from October 17, 1862, to June 6, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTHER GRAVES.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1167.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1167) granting a pension to Esther Graves, by which the Secretary of the Interior is to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Esther Graves, late a nurse in the Army, and pay her a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing January 1, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK DENNING.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1168.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1168) granting a pension to Frederick Denning was considered in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frederick Denning, father of William F. Denning, late a second lieutenant in the ninth Maine volunteers, commencing July 22, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HELEN N. WOLF.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1403.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1403) granting a pension to Helen L. Wolf was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Helen L. Wolf, widow of John Wolf, late a private in company K, of the one hundred and eleventh regiment of New York infantry, commencing March 23, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM SMITH.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1404.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1404) granting a pension to William Smith was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William Smith, late a corporal in company H, of the tenth United States infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH LAMAR

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1405.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1405) granting a pension to Elizabeth Lamar was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior is directed by the bill to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Lamar, mother of James Curtis Lamar, who was killed while fighting with an organization of Union men in Kentucky, and pay her a pension of eight dollars per month, commencing September 20, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INDEFINITELY POSTPONED.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I now move to take up, with a view to its indefinite postponement, House bill No. 1406, granting a pension to Patrick Collins.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. We have already passed a bill for his relief to-night. I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to take up House bill No. 1388, granting a pension to Kate Higgins, which was passed over a short time ago.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that that bill also be indefinitely postponed, as a bill has already passed for her relief.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN GRIDLEY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1407.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1407) granting a pension to John Gridley was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Gridley, late of company G, of the ninth regiment of Michigan volunteers, commencing February 4, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATHERINE GENSER.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1408.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1408) granting a pension to Catherine Gensler was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catherine Gensler, mother of John D. Gensler, late a private in company I, one hundred and forty-ninth regiment of Pennsylvania volunteers, commencing June 29, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASA F. HOLCOMB.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1409.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1409) granting a pension to Asa F. Holcomb was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Asa F. Holcomb, late a private in company B, of the twenty-fourth regiment of New York cavalry, commencing September 9, 1864.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH BERRY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1410.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1410) granting back pension to the minor children of Joseph Berry was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary E. Berry and Louisa Berry, minor children of Joseph Berry, late a private in company B, fourth regiment of Iowa volunteers, commencing October 27, 1862, and to continue until November 26, 1867.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POLLY W. COTTON.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1411.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1411) granting a pension to Polly W. Cotton was considered as in Committee of the Whole. Subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws the name of Polly W. Cotton, widow of Wayne W. Cotton, late of company G, of the seventh regiment of Tennessee infantry, is to be placed on the pension-roll, and receive a pension as the widow of a captain, in lieu of the pension she is and has been receiving, commencing April 18, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM R. SILVEY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1412.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1412) granting a pension to the children of William R. Silvey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior is to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the names of William A. Silvey and Mary Elizabeth Ann Silvey, children under sixteen years of William R. Silvey, late a private in company B, second regiment of Tennessee infantry, commencing November 13, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JANE ROOK.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1413.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1413) granting a pension to Jane Rook was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary of the Interior is to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane Rook, mother of James C. Rook, late a private in company A, of the third regiment of Maine volunteer infantry, commencing July 16, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SARAH K. JOHNSON.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1414.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1414) granting a pension to Sarah K. Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah K. Johnson, late of Salisbury, North Carolina, at the rate of thirty dollars per month, commencing March 4, 1863, and to continue during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES D. COX.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1420.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1420) directing the Commissioner of Pensions to proceed to hear evidence and determine the right of W. H. Cox, deceased, late a sergeant in company F, second regiment Pennsylvania artillery, to a pension in the same manner as if he was still living, he having died of disease contracted while a prisoner of war at Andersonville, Georgia, and if found to be entitled to a pension then the same, from time of his discharge till death, to be paid over to his father, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that W. H. Cox, a hale, hearty, young man of about twenty years of age, residing with his father, Charles D. Cox, of Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, and being a part of his family, on the 16th day of February, 1864, was enrolled as a sergeant in company F, second regiment Pennsylvania artillery, to serve three years or during the war; that he was regularly mustered in as such, and at the battle of Cold Harbor, Virginia, on or about the 2d of June, 1864, was taken prisoner by the rebels and sent to Andersonville, Georgia, and there confined as a prisoner of war for the period of ten months, and from exposure and lack of food became very much debilitated, and after being released he was on the 8th of August, 1865, at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, by virtue of a telegram dated Adjutant General's office, May 12, 1865, honorably discharged from the United States service; that after reaching his father's residence he made application for a pension under existing laws, in consequence of disease contracted in line of duty, and before the case was finally disposed of, on July 9, 1866, he died of disease contracted, and the Commissioner then declined to proceed further in the case, being of opinion that the death of the young man suspended further proceedings; and that Charles D. Cox, father of the deceased soldier, is desirous of obtaining the pension justly due his son from the date of his discharge till death, to be applied to the purchase of a suitable monument to be placed at his grave. The bill therefore proceeds to direct the Commissioner of Pensions to proceed and receive proof of the right of W. H. Cox to a pension in the same manner as if he were still living, and if the evidence satisfies him that he was so entitled, then the pension from time of his discharge till his death is to be paid over to his father, Charles D. Cox.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANCY SMITH.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 633.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nancy Smith, widow of Benjamin H. Smith, late a private in company E, twenty-third regiment Massachusetts volunteers, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 1st day of March, 1865, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VIOLET HENRY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 634.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 634) granting a pension to Violet Henry was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Violet Henry, the widow of Sherrod Henry, late a private in company D, sixteenth regiment United States colored troops, and for paying her a pension at the rate of eight dollars per month, commencing July 17, 1865, and also the sum of two dollars per month for Easter Henry, child under sixteen years of age of Sherrod and Violet, from the 25th day of July, 1866, until she attains the age of sixteen.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA E. KING.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 256.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Martha E. King was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Paymaster General to pay to Martha E. King, widow of Clinton King, late of the county of Carroll and State of Tennessee, deceased, a sum equal to the pay of a first lieutenant of cavalry from the 15th of September, 1863, to the 10th of March, 1864; and to the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Martha E. King on the pension-roll, at the rate provided by law for the widow of a first lieutenant of cavalry who died in the military service of the United States of disease contracted while in such service and in the line of duty since the 4th day of March, 1861.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF 1812.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to take up House bill No. 608.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 608) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The Senate has taken up this bill. This is the last of the pension bills.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a general bill.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. It will not take five minutes. It has been read and partly acted on.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is not the kind of bill we came here for this evening.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist on my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 23, 1868.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. Mr. FRENCH.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] desires to have some ten or fifteen minutes for the purpose of making a personal explanation. I therefore move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with in order to allow him that time.

The motion was agreed to.

DR. BENJAMIN MALONE.

Mr. RAUM, by unanimous consent, submitted a report from the Committee on Military Affairs upon the application of Dr. Benjamin Malone, late paymaster of volunteers, for relief of himself and his sureties; which was ordered to be printed, and recommitted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation for fifteen minutes.

No objection was made, and leave was granted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will first ask the Clerk to read some remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] on Friday, the 17th instant, so that the statements to which I desire to reply may be recalled to the recollection of members. He was speaking of the payment of the five-twenty bonds.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I want to say that if this loan was to be paid according to the intimation of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS:] if I knew that any party in this country would go for paying in coin that which is payable in money, thus enhancing it one half, if I knew there was such a platform and such a determination this day on the part of any party, I would vote for the other side, Frank Blair and all. I would vote for no such swindle upon the tax-payers of this country. I would vote for no such speculation in favor of the large bondholders, the millionaires, who took advantage of our folly in granting them coin payment of interest. And I declare—well, it is hard to say it—but if even Frank Blair stood upon the platform paying the bonds according to the contract, and the Republican candidates stood upon the platform of paying bloated speculators twice the amount which we agreed to pay them, then I would vote for Frank Blair, even if a worse man than Seymour headed the ticket. That is all I want to say."

A few days afterward I expressed my surprise at these statements of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and referred to the fact that in the debate of 1862, on the passage of the bill authorizing the five-twenty bonds, the gentleman distinctly declared that these bonds were payable in gold, and that such was the unanimous opinion and intention of Congress at that time.

Yesterday the gentleman read from manuscript the following:

"Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, rising to a personal explanation, said: I desire to say a few words relating to what I observe reported in the Globe of the remarks of General GARFIELD and others with regard to what I said in debate on the passage of the five-twenty bill. I find that it is all taken from a report of Secretary McCulloch, which I had never read. I am therefore free to presume that which those gentlemen quoted, rather than said, as a total perversion of the truth. Had it not been introduced from so respectable a quarter in this House it would not be too harsh, as there presented, to call it an absolute falsehood. I do not know that I should have taken any notice of what various papers are repeating, some of them half secession, and more of them, I suppose, in the pay of the bondholders. I shall not now undertake to explain the whole of this matter, as I am too feeble; but I shall take occasion hereafter to expose the villainy of those who charge me with having said, on the passage of the five-twenty bill, that its bonds were payable in coin. The whole debate from which they quote, and all my remarks which they cited, were made upon an entirely different bill, as might be seen by observing that I speak only of the payment of gold after twenty years, when the bill I was speaking of, as well as all the liabilities, were payable in coin, as no one doubted the resumption of specie payments. My speech was made upon the introduction of the legal-tender bill, on which the interest for twenty years was to be paid in currency. No question of paying the interest in gold arose till some time after, when the bill had been passed by the House, sent to the Senate, returned, and went to a committee of conference, where, for the first time, the gold-bearing question was introduced, and yet all that these wise and thoughtful gentlemen have quoted from me took place in debate some weeks before the gold question, either principal or interest, had arisen in the House. I only now want to caution the public against putting faith in the publications of demagogues, and they will find that every word which I have asserted with regard to myself is true to the letter."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I can permit no such denial of the truth of my statement, and particularly no such personal attack to go unchallenged. I therefore appeal to the records. On the 22d day of January, 1862, Hon. E. G. Spaulding, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported House bill No. 240, a bill to authorize the issue of United States notes and for the redemption or funding thereof, and for funding the floating debt of the United States. It consisted of three sections. The first authorized the issue of $100,000,000 legal-tender notes; the second authorized the issue of $500,000,000 of six per cent. twenty-year bonds, with which to fund the legal-tender note and other floating debt of the United States; the third was mainly administrative. (See copy of original bill, Globe, vol. 46, p. 522.) This bill, with but few important changes, became the act of February 25, 1862. On the day of its introduction it was printed and made the special order for January 28, when a searching debate on its provisions began and continued with uninterrupted of but one legislative day, to and including the 6th of February.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania took no active part in the debate until the day of its passage, when, after general debate on the bill in Committee of the Whole was closed by order of the House, Hon. E. G. Spaulding yielded to Mr. STEVENS most of the hour to which he was entitled, and then the gentleman [Mr. STEVENS] made a vigorous and incisive speech, as he always did, attacking the several substitutes that had been offered, and defended the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means. One substitute had been offered by Mr. Vallandigham, of Ohio, another by Mr. Roscoe Conkling, of New York, another by Mr. Morrill, of Vermont, and another by Mr. Horton, of Ohio, which embraced the leading features of all the others, and was finally selected as the one to be voted on in opposition to the bill of the committee. This substitute did not make United States notes a legal tender for private debts, and this was the chief issue between the advocates and opponents of the bill of the committee.

A large part of the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] was devoted to the defense of the legal-tender clause of the bill. He held that without the legal-tender provision the notes would depreciate; with it they would remain at par. He quoted a long passage from the English writer McCulloch to show that paper money which is a legal-tender will always be at par so long as the amount issued is not in excess of the wants of the country. At that point a question was asked him by Judge Thomas, of Massachusetts. I quote from the Globe of February 6, 1862, page 688:

"Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in connection with that passage. McCulloch laid down the doctrine that the paper is limited to the amount necessary for currency. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he now expects, in managing these financial matters, to limit the amount of these notes to $150,000,000? Is that his expectation?"

"Mr. STEVENS. It is. I expect that is the maximum amount to be issued."

"Mr. THOMAS. You do not expect to call for any more?"

"Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; I do not."

The gentleman then proceeded to show that these legal-tender notes would soon be used to buy the bonds authorized in the second section, and that the bonds would be a good investment. He said:

"This money would soon lodge in large quantities with the capitalists and banks, who must take them. But the instinct of gain—perhaps I may call it avarice—would not allow them to keep it long unproductive. A dollar in a miser's safe unproductive is a sore disturbance. Where could he invest it? In United States loans at six per cent., redeemable in gold in twenty years, the best and most valuable permanent investment that could be desired. The Government would thus again possess such notes in exchange for bonds, and again reissue them. I have no doubt that thus the $500,000,000 of bonds authorized would be absorbed in less time than would be needed by Government, and thus $150,000,000 would do the work of $500,000,000 of bonds."

"When further loans were wanted you need only authorize the sale of more bonds. The same $150,000,000 of notes will be ready to take them."—Globe, vol. 46, p. 688.

A little further on, on the same page, he said:

"Gentlemen are clamorous in favor of those who have debts due them, lest the debtor should the more easily pay his debt. I do not much sympathize with such importunate money-lenders. But widows and orphans are interested and in tears lest their estates should be badly invested. I pity no one who has his money invested in United States bonds, payable in gold in twenty years, with interest semi-annually."

He then proceeded to review the several substitutes, stating first the plan of the committee. I quote from the same page:

"Let me restate the various projects. Ours proposes United States notes, secured at the end of twenty years to be paid in coin, and the interest raised by taxation semi-annually; such notes to be money, and of uniform value throughout the Union. No better investment, in my judgment, can be had. No better currency can be invented."

"* * * * *

"The proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ROSCOE CONKLING,] authorizes the issuing of seven per cent. bonds payable in thirty-one years to be sold ($250,000,000 of it) or exchanged for the currency of the banks of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia."

"Sir, this proposition seems to me to lack every element of wise legislation. Make a loan payable in irredeemable currency, and pay that in its depreciated condition to our contractors, soldiers, and creditors generally! The banks would issue unlimited amounts of what would become trash, and buy good hard-money bonds of the nation! Was there ever such a temptation to swindle?"

On the following page, and near the end of his speech, he says:

"Here, then, in a few words, lies your choice. Throw bonds at six or seven per cent. on the market between this and December, enough to raise at least $600,000,000, or issue United States notes, not redeemable in coin, but fundable in specie-paying bonds at twenty years."

In a few moments after the conclusion of this speech the House voted to reject the substitute of Mr. Horton and adopted the bill advocated by Mr. STEVENS.

It was sent to the Senate, and but few important amendments were made, the chief of which was that the legal-tender clause should not apply to duties on imports, but that they should be paid in coin, and the coin should be applied to payment of the interest on the bonds and to the reduction of the principal of the debt. No change was made in the bill which in any manner affected the question of the payment of the principal of the bonds.

On the 14th of February the bill came back to the House and was made a special order for February 19, when it was again debated, some of the amendments adopted, and some rejected; and after submitting the differences between the two Houses to a conference committee it was passed February 25, and on the following day became a law by receiving the approval of the President.

I have carefully gone over all the proceedings as recorded in the Globe and in the Journal of the House, and I have not found an intimation made, directly or indirectly, by any member that it was ever dreamed the principal of these bonds could be paid in anything but gold. On the contrary, all who did refer to the subject spoke in the most positive terms that, as a matter of course, they were payable in gold.

Mr. Spalding, of New York, said:

"They intend to foot all the bills, and ultimately pay the whole, principal and interest, in gold and silver."—Globe, vol. 46, p. 882.

Mr. POMEROY, who is now a member of the House, said:

"The credit of the Government is alike bound for the payment of both these classes of indebtedness ultimately in gold; each derives its entire value from that."—Id., p. 885.

Mr. PIKE, of Maine, now a member of this House, said:

"With all due deference to the gentleman who differ with me on this subject, it does seem to me that this matter of paying the interest in coin is a controversy about goats' wool. The interest will be paid in coin in any event."—Id., p. 887.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have proved from the record the correctness of every declaration I made in reference to the opinion of Congress at the time of the passage of the five-twenty bill, and particularly the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This might seem sufficient, but I wish to carry the investigation a step further.

About one year later, when the House was debating the bill for issuing what are now known as ten-forty bonds, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who had offered an amendment to make the interest payable in paper, interjected into a speech of Mr. Horton, of Ohio, the following remark, (see Globe, January 19, 1863, page 388:)

"It would be fair, I suppose, to state that my amendment proposes to pay for these bonds at the end of ten years in coin, but to pay the interest in currency, while the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means proposes to redeem the bonds in currency."

"Mr. HORTON. I cannot state what the gentleman asks me to state, because, according to my view, it is not correct. The bill of the Committee of Ways and Means does not contemplate paying in paper."

"Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?"

"Mr. HORTON. Certainly."

"Mr. STEVENS. Are not the bonds payable 'in lawful money,' whatever that is?"

"Mr. HORTON. No, sir."

"Mr. STEVENS. Then the Committee of Ways and Means and I do not agree as to its meaning."

"Mr. HORTON. I speak only for myself, and I appeal to the bill. The policy of the bill is to pay the interest in coin, and to collect the imposts in coin, and to redeem the bonds in twenty years in coin."

So far as I can learn, this was the first word over spoken in Congress suggesting the possibility of paying these bonds in anything but coin.

Now, notice the effect of this suggestion. On the following day, January 20, while the same bill was pending, Mr. Thomas, of Massachusetts, moved to amend by inserting the words, "in coin" in the first section. Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, moved to add the words "and bullion." Then Mr. Horton said, (see Globe, vol. 47, page 412:)

"I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, which is to include bullion with gold in the payment of these bonds; and am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to make them payable in gold. I wish to say here that the Committee of Ways and Means, in framing this bill, never dreamed that these twenty-year bonds were payable in anything other than gold, until the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] told it yesterday upon the floor of the House."

"Mr. STEVENS. I do not like to refer to what occurred in committee, but I ask the gentleman from Vermont whether he did not state that he expected they would be paid in legal money?"

"Mr. HORTON. I say to the gentleman and to this committee, that I never heard an expression by any member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the possibility that these bonds were to be payable in anything other than coin. The form here proposed is the form always used by the Government in the issue of these bonds, and they have always been paid in coin up to this day, even as late as the 31st day of December, the bonds then coming due were paid in coin in accordance with the uniform established practice of the Government."

"Mr. STEVENS. I ought to say that I am informed by the gentleman from Vermont that he did not make the remark in the committee which I just attributed to him. I so understood him."

"Mr. HORTON. I know nothing of any such remark."

The amendment of Mr. Thomas was then adopted without division.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that when the original five-twenty bond bill passed the House in 1862 all who referred to the subject stated that the principal of those bonds was payable in gold; that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] so stated five distinct times, and no member suggested anything to the contrary; that when in 1863 that gentleman raised a doubt on the subject he was promptly met by the statement of a leading member of the Committee of Ways and Means that he never before heard such a suggestion, and nobody on the Committee of Ways and Means dreamed of the possibility of paying them in anything but coin; and finally, from abundant caution, and because of the doubt thus raised, the words "in coin" were inserted in the law authorizing the ten-forty bonds, and so far as the record shows no other member, either in 1862 or in 1863, shared the gentleman's doubt. Let it be remembered that I have not discussed the language of the law, but only its history and the construction placed upon it by those who made it at the time they made it.

At the expiration of the fifteen minutes allowed Mr. GARFIELD,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved that his time be extended for three minutes.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object. I do not want to have a speech on one side only.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not a speech.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is as near like a speech as anything I ever heard.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask leave to print the conclusion of my remarks.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I suppose I am not allowed to reply to the gentleman now. I have no controversy with him. Why it is he has renewed the attack upon me God only knows. I only referred to him as speaking the language of another, the Secretary of the Treasury; and when the proper time comes I will show there is not a word of truth in what either one of them says.

INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

Mr. SPALDING. I rise to submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations on the Senate amendments to House bill No. 541, making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the amendments of the Senate be reported. The gentleman has promised to give me twenty minutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following to the bill:

SEC.—And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, for the purposes hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869:

Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia:

For the support, clothing, medical, and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane, including $500 for books, stationery, and incidental expenses, $90,500.

For finishing, furnishing, lighting, and heating the unfinished part of the east wing of the main hospital edifice, $7,000.

Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb:

For the support of the institution, including $1,000 for books and illustrative apparatus, $25,000.

For the proper inclosure, improvement, and enlargement of the grounds of the institution, in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, $5,600.

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum:

For the support of the asylum, over and above the probable amount which will be received from independent or pay patients, $15,000.

For the completion of the Providence Hospital, in Washington city, District of Columbia, $30,000.

For the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, $10,000.

For care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SPALDING. The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in the amendment for the proper inclosure, &c., of the grounds of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, reducing the appropriation from $5,600 to $3,600. They also recommend concurrence in the amendment for the completion of the Providence Hospital, with the following proviso:

Provided, That all expenditures for the said Providence Hospital, under appropriations of Congress, shall be made under the direction and control of the Surgeon General of the Army, whose duty it shall be to report at the December session of every Congress a full and complete statement of the expenses incurred under and by virtue of appropriations made by Congress.

They also recommend concurrence in the appropriation for transient paupers with the following proviso:

Provided, Said contract shall be made by the Surgeon General of the Army, who shall report to the December session of every Congress, stating with whom the said contract is made and the amount thereof.

They recommend concurrence in all the others without amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio yields to me to move an amendment to the bill.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to amend the bill when it has been adopted by both Houses?

The SPEAKER. It cannot be amended, but it is in order to move to add to it.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add to the bill as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior, the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Surgeon General of the Army, the chief of the Bureau of Medical Surgery of the Navy, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings, Grounds, and Works, shall constitute a commission, which shall be known and designated as the "Commission of Charities for the District of Columbia."

SEC.—And be it further enacted, That the said commission shall organize immediately upon the passage of this act, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be president thereof, and he shall designate as secretary of the said commission a clerk of his Department, who is of the fourth class, and who shall keep a record of all the proceedings and transactions of the said commission.

SEC.—And be it further enacted, That the said commission shall have the full control and direction of all the appropriations made by Congress to the charitable institutions of the said District of Columbia, and of all such appropriations as may be made for the purpose of charity in the said District, and shall have the power of visitation and examination of all the institutions in the said District to the support of which appropriations shall be made by Congress. No money shall be drawn from the appropriations made to the charitable institutions of the District, or for the purposes of charity in said District, except upon the requisition of the president of the commission, made upon an order of the commission, duly entered in the journal of their proceedings, and all the accounts of the said board shall be audited by the First Auditor of the Treasury. And it is hereby provided that the provisions of this act shall not be deemed to include the Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

SEC.—And be it further enacted That no money shall be expended for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, for the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, and for the Providence Hospital, until the title to the property, real and personal, of such institutions shall be transferred to the United States by conveyances, certified as being valid by the Attorney General of the United States, and conveying all the right, title, and interest of the said institutions in the property conveyed.

SEC.—And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the said commission to make a full report to Congress, at the December session of each year, of all its transactions and of all the expenditures made under its direction, together with a statement of the condition of the charitable institutions of the District for which appropriations shall have been previously made and which shall have been expended under its direction.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. There is another amendment which the gentleman from Ohio consents I shall offer, to reduce the amount appropriated for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb from $25,000 to $12,500.

The SPEAKER. That amendment will also be considered as pending.

Mr. SPALDING. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] is now entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. SPALDING. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] for twenty minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope, Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy that much time, because this question has already been pretty thoroughly discussed; and I would not ask any time if I did not think the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] did me injustice, unintentional of course, when this question was up the other day, in replying, I think, with undue severity to the points which I made in my report. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, upon which you, Mr. Speaker, placed me, it became my duty to the House and the country to examine into the matters connected with this institution for the deaf and dumb. In my report, which was concurred in by three other members of the committee, making the minority four against five, I showed that we had appropriated $825,000 to this private corporation; and that this vast sum had been expended without any control or direction on the part of the United States. What I maintained was that when we make appropriations for charities in the District—and I will not be behind any man in making such appropriations in proper amounts for deserving objects and under adequate restrictions—it is our duty to see that the expenditure of these appropriations is under proper control and direction by the Government which appropriates for them. I showed that the party connected with this institution who has had the disbursement of this vast sum of $825,000 has only given one bond, which was given in 1862 for $3,000; that we have had no control of that disbursement, and have no proper knowledge of how it was made. I ask gentlemen whether this is the manner in which to vote away the money of our constituents to an institution of this kind?

I acknowledge that it is our duty to educate and take care of every deaf and dumb person belonging to the District of Columbia unable to procure an education, but I am unwilling that we shall establish here a great eleemosynary institution for the benefit of all the States of the Union; we have no constitutional right to do it. I offered the other day my substitute for the bill, creating a commission to overlook and control the funds appropriated for charitable purposes. That proposition would not affect the appropriations we have already made, but would establish a commission to have control and direction in regard to the expenditure of our appropriations, to exercise the power of visitation and investigation, and to report to us at every session the manner in which the money has been disbursed.

As matters now stand we go on making these appropriations year after year, putting the money into the hands, not of officers of the Government giving bond for their fidelity, but of the representatives of these various institutions, who use the money as they please. Look for one moment at the manner in which your money has been applied, and observe how your appropriations for this institution have grown up. In 1864 there were twenty-four pupils in this institution, and we appropriated $4,400. In 1865 there were thirty-five pupils, and we appropriated $7,500. In 1866 there were twenty-two pupils, and we appropriated $12,500. In 1867, there were twenty-five pupils, and we appropriated $20,434. For 1868 I have no return of the number of pupils, but I believe it was about the same; and in that year our appropriation jumped up to $25,000.

Where does this amount go? Who has the control of it? Practically in this way: the superintendent of this institution takes this money and puts it into his own pocket or into the hands of those whom he chooses to employ at whatever salary he may fix. As to the control of the board of directors of the institution it amounts to nothing. Yet the House, when this bill was under consideration heretofore, refused to agree to the proposition for the appointment of a commission to superintend the expenditure of our appropriations for these purposes, to see that the money is justly and fairly used, to examine the accounts, and to report to Congress the particulars of the disbursement. And now, sir, the Senate have put in this sum of $25,000 for expenses, &c., for the coming year. I have submitted an amendment to reduce the amount to $12,500. In 1866 there were twenty-two pupils, and we gave them $12,500, an increase from the amount appropriated the year before, which was $7,500. I propose to give them this same amount of $12,500 for this year. It is to pay the teachers for this institution, and for the education of the twenty-five pupils whom we undertake to educate. I showed to the House the other day that while it was our duty to educate these pupils, we could send them to the best institutions of this country and have them educated better than they are educated here, and for less than $7,000. I proposed an amendment which was lost by only three votes, to the effect that if this institution was to be kept here, and if we are to make still further appropriations, those appropriations shall not be more than I have indicated in my amendment.

Now there is another question for you to consider. Are you ready to make these appropriations for these private institutions, to build up their immense buildings, their colleges, and their out-buildings, and to furnish them with everything, and at the same time to have no control over the property? I showed you the other day how much Congress had given for this institution, and how much others had given. I think the sum of sixteen or twenty thousand dollars was about the amount contributed by others, while Congress has appropriated $325,000! And how much is it now proposed to pay for this institution out of the people's money? In the bill we passed the other day there were $48,000 for putting up a building, and $3,000 for some other purpose. The Senate propose to add to that $25,000 and $3,500. That makes nearly eighty thousand dollars which it is proposed to give to this institution, when your constituents are already groaning under taxation; you propose to take it from their pockets and give it to this private institution. That is $70,000 more than is necessary in order to educate all these pupils as they should be educated, and as I agree they should be educated.

Now, if gentlemen have attended to the reading of my substitute they will have seen that it is simply a proposition to designate certain parties to be a commission, to cost the Government nothing. It provides that this commission shall take charge of the several amounts thus appropriated. Now, when you appropriate $25,000 or $12,500 for these teachers out here is there anything wrong in having a commission of our own to fix the salaries of these teachers, to see that large and unjustifiable salaries are not paid to them, and that a greater number are not employed than there is occasion for?

Mr. WELKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELKER. I want to know whether the effect of the gentleman's amendment will not be to adopt these institutions as national institutions. I observe that by the terms of his amendment these institutions are to convey their title to the property to the General Government or they cannot use the appropriations made in the bill. And I want to know whether the gentleman's proposition is to make this Providence hospital in this city a national institution; and I also want to know whether the gentleman's proposition is to make the lying-in hospital a national institution? I want to know whether the purport and effect of the gentleman's amendment will not be to make these institutions national, and compel us hereafter to keep them up as such?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I answer most unhesitatingly it would not. The very effect of the amendment is to prevent that; and I ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] if he is willing to go on and build for every kind of private corporation in this District immense buildings and tax our constituents to pay for them, costing many hundred thousand dollars, and yet have no security in the property and no control over it?

Mr. WELKER. Certainly not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Now, I do not wish to detain the House at this late period of the session longer than I think it to be my duty. As I said before, I deemed it my duty to examine into the matter as a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I did examine into it, and I have shown to the House the state of things which exists in regard to the deaf and dumb asylum. I insisted the other day, and I insist now, that while we make these appropriations we shall demand that there be a commission appointed which shall have some control over these expenditures. For instance, here is an appropriation for the support of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Hospital, $15,000. Who is to control that appropriation? As your laws now stand nobody but the parties now in the institution. They can do with the money as they please, and we cannot help ourselves. I propose that we shall adopt a remedy; that while we give that sum we shall have the means of knowing that it has been properly expended.

Again, we have an appropriation for the Providence Hospital in the District of Columbia, $30,000. We have already, as I believe, appropriated $120,000 for that hospital. It is a private corporation, and private parties have entire control over it. We have put up a building there, and now we are asked to appropriate $30,000. If you adopt the amendment that I propose, which does not take away the appropriation, at the commencement of the next session of Congress you will have a report as to how the money has been appropriated and expended.

Then there is another sum of $10,000 for the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home, a most benevolent object, and I do not object to the appropriation. I believe the appropriation is now honestly and carefully administered by benevolent ladies of the highest character, who give their labors to the object in the noblest spirit. But we have a right to have our appropriations looked into in this as well as in all other like matters, and have a report upon the manner in which the funds are used. I am certain those in control of this matter will have no objection to this.

Then there is another sum of $12,000 for the support and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers. That comes in the same category as the other appropriations here, and what I desire and what I demand is that when we give these appropriations we shall have a commission to control them, and a commission that will report to us how that money has been spent. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not propose to take up much of the time of the House. We have heretofore very fully discussed this whole subject. I will only say in reply to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN]—for I am still proud to call him my friend, notwithstanding he says I indulged in some sharpness of rebuke on a former occasion—I say in reply to him that I feel as forcibly the obligations resting on the members of the Committee on Appropriations as that gentleman can possibly feel them, and I think a majority of that committee are as sensible of their duty to the public and the people of this great country; but we do not always look upon the same matters in the same light; we do not look at them through the same medium, and it is not strange that there should be a difference of opinion. The majority of the Committee on Appropriations favor the several items embraced in this bill, as well in the original bill as it passed the House and the Senate as in the amendment now ingrafted on the bill by the action of the Senate; for let it be understood that these amendments are only the items embraced in the general charitable appropriation bill which is now in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and which has once been considered by the Committee of the Whole, excepting the two last items; it was left in an unfinished state, and the Senate, fearing that there might not be time to get that bill through the regular channels, put these amendments into the other bill and sent them to the House for its action; so that this bill, with the Senate amendments, now embraces all the charitable appropriations for the District of Columbia which are recognized and recommended by your Committee on Appropriations. We have reduced the amount somewhat, but the committee do not believe it to be desirable to adopt what the gentleman from Illinois offered as a substitute on a former occasion, and now proposes as an amendment to the amendments of the Senate. It is a provision forming what is called a "Commission of Charities," and requiring these several benevolent institutions, before they can use one dollar of the money which the bill appropriates, to convey to the United States the whole title to their property.

Well, now, I wish to have it understood that so far as it regards the Providence Hospital, which is the institution of the Sisters of Charity, here in the city of Washington, we might just as well strike out the appropriation at once, for we all know that they have a policy of their own in regard to the holding of their real estate. I do not sympathize with them religiously, but I do sympathize with them in their charitable disposition. We give this money to help them to build a wing to their asylum for the sick, poor, and distressed, who happen to fall within the limits of the city of Washington.

Mr. WELKER. I ask my colleague to allow a motion to be made to amend by striking out this appropriation for the Providence Hospital.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I can allow no further motion to amend, and the gentleman knows I cannot, as the previous question has been seconded. I have, in the superabundance of my indulgence, allowed the gentleman from Illinois to offer his two amendments.

Mr. WELKER. Will my colleague allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to amend his proposition so as to embrace that?

Mr. SPALDING. I do not yield the floor.

The SPEAKER. A separate vote can be demanded on each of the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to say, if the House requires information on that subject, that these institutions are in the hands of trustees who manage their concerns. Now, the imputation is a very gratuitous one, thrown out by the learned gentleman from Illinois upon the gentleman at the head of the institution for the deaf and dumb, that he is expending twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars a year of the people's money, and paying himself and all under him just what sums he pleases without any check or control upon him. That is not so, and the gentleman knows it. In the first place, there are trustees for the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. Congress have heretofore appointed certain individuals to act as corporators of that institution, and have from time to time put that institution under such control as they in their wisdom saw fit. They have now, in the bill as it has passed the House and as it passed the Senate, prevented that institution from parting with a single foot of its land or a single dollar's worth of its personal property for any other purpose than for the purpose of the education of the deaf and dumb. They cannot part with any of their real estate at all without a special act of Congress. And I say further, that if it be the pleasure of Congress to exact it at their hands, or whether it be or not, these trustees hold this property only in trust for the use of the deaf and dumb who are educated at that institution, and it cannot be divested from that purpose without the assent of Congress. The courts of the land would never allow it; the property was given for that purpose; the fund was created for that purpose. These trustees are entirely willing that the United States should take a fee-simple title to every foot of their land.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] quite clear that even an act of Congress would authorize these trustees to divest themselves of the title placed in them by the original holder for a specific trust without the consent of the party creating the trust?

Mr. SPALDING. I do not claim that a donation for a particular purpose by an individual can be perverted or diverted even by consent of Congress.

Mr. MULLINS. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well.

Mr. MULLINS. He states that there is a provision in this bill prohibiting these parties who own this property from ever selling it, unless by permission of Congress. Now, he has just stated that it is impossible to do so even by act of Congress. And hence it is a difficulty with me all the time, which I should like to have the gentleman explain.

Mr. SPALDING. If I was to stand here and endeavor to explain all the scruples of my learned and astute friend from Tennessee, [Mr. MULLINS,] it would take up all the time of this Congress. His colleague [Mr. MAYNARD] has made it clear by his statement. The courts must enforce the trust, but they cannot take it away from them. No State Legislature can take it away from them; no Congress can do it. The trust must be carried out according to the purpose of the original donor. That is all that the gentleman claims. The amendment recommended by the committee of course I ask may be adopted. But the first amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] is that the annual appropriation for the next fiscal year shall be cut down from $25,000 to $12,500.

Mr. WELKER. Will my colleague [Mr. SPALDING] state how the title to the Providence Hospital is vested, and whether under this bill that corporation could not convey to the Government a good title to their property; and also whether it is not an independent private corporation holding its property for a specific purpose?

Mr. SPALDING. I understand that the Providence Hospital, under control of the Sisters of Charity, was incorporated by act of Congress, the property being placed in the hands of trustees. That is the way I understand it; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] understands better about that matter than I do. That property is now in the hands of trustees for the purpose of a hospital, and these women are doing more good in the District of Columbia in the way of charity, I understand, than any other set of persons whatever.

I was about to say when I was interrupted that this appropriation of $25,000 ought not to be cut down to $12,500, for the reason that three years ago Congress established a collegiate department in the deaf and dumb institution, where all the arts and sciences are taught in the highest branches, and where there is a regular corps of professors and teachers. That is the way the expenses have been increased. Ten students were received for education in the higher branches in order to be fitted for teachers in similar institutions in the different States. The appropriation for last year was $25,000. The directors of the institution think they can receive an additional number of fifteen students from the different States, with a like appropriation of $25,000 for this year. If the appropriation is reduced to $12,500 then that will be stopped; there is no doubt about that.

We are satisfied, then, that the regular operations of the institution, as countenanced, encouraged, and directed by Congress, require an outlay of $25,000 for the next fiscal year. The $48,000 which has passed both Houses is intended to complete the unfinished building; and the $8,000 is in the nature of a deficiency to pay for the ten additional students who came in last year from the different States.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has alluded to this donation—I may call it a donation—of $30,000 to assist the Sisters of Charity in finishing the last wing of their hospital. It will probably cost them more than twice that sum; but they raise the residue from private donations. Now, it is not to be presumed that they are going to convey the title of their whole institution to Congress, because Congress makes a contribution of one third or one half of the expense of erecting a wing to their hospital.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my friend from Ohio give me his attention for a moment?

Mr. SPALDING. I cannot yield any further time, because I must dispose of this subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If you will give me just a moment, it will facilitate this matter.

Mr. SPALDING. I do not yield. Mr. Speaker, I now say in conclusion that the Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence in the Senate amendments with amendments which they themselves have attached. They recommend in the strongest terms that the amendments now proposed by the gentleman from Illinois upon his own responsibility be voted down. I hope that will be done. I leave the whole question with the House. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say a word, Mr. Speaker, upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] proposed, as I understand, upon his own individual responsibility and not with the sanction of the committee. It proposes to create in the District of Columbia a commission of charities, to consist of the chief justice of the supreme court of the District, the Secretary of the Interior, the Surgeon General, the chief of the Bureau of Medical Surgery in the Navy, and the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds. I submit that we have no authority to impose this duty upon these several officials. If they should undertake it in compliance with this legislation, it would be a purely voluntary and gratuitous act on their part. Administering charities here constitutes no part of their regular official duties; and how they would be likely to administer this newly-imposed task we can very well understand, if we imagine such an obligation imposed unwillingly upon us in addition to our other obligations and our other official duties.

When we accepted the ten miles square from the States of Maryland and Virginia, we did it under the constitutional provision and guarantee that we were to exercise exclusive legislative power over this District and the people residing here. I submit that we ought to provide for these people charities and charitable institutions, at least commensurate with those which the people of the several States provide for themselves. The legislation now contemplated does nothing more than that; it does not do so much as many of the States have done for themselves. All these institutions have their own appropriate boards of supervision, consisting of persons interested in the great objects for which they were established and endowed; and I submit respectfully to the gentleman from Illinois, or any who may hold similar views, that it is better to leave these charities in the hands of those whom we must admit have efficiently and effectively administered them, and not seek to put them in the hands of a board such as is proposed to be constituted here. We have already, I am reminded, provided for the appointment of three members of Congress to serve upon the board of directors of the institution for the deaf and dumb. Their efficiency in that capacity will of course depend very much upon their disposition to act on that board.

Mr. MULLINS. I wish to ask my colleague whether the appointment of members of Congress to be directors of this institution is not liable to the same objection as the appointment of the commission proposed by the gentleman from Illinois? Is not the time of members of Congress as much taken up as that of the officers named in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MAYNARD. I think the gentleman will see a very wide difference between the appointment of three members of Congress to act with the board already in existence, and the designation of these officials—

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. With the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee, I wish to say that, if I recollect aright, we have by our amendment put the expenditure under the supervision of the Surgeon General.

Mr. MAYNARD. That is as far as the hospital is concerned. I am speaking of other charities. But I will not prolong these remarks.

Mr. SPALDING. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The principal point of objection is the transfer of property. I will strike that section out and modify my amendment. I understand that will be satisfactory to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who has more knowledge on this subject than any of us.

First amendment of the Senate:

Add the following:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, for the purposes hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Add as follows:

Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia:

For the support, clothing, medical and moral treatment of the insane of the Army and Navy and revenue-cutter service, and of the indigent insane of the District of Columbia in the Government Hospital for the Insane, including $500 for books, stationery, and incidental expenses, $90,500.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

Add as follows:

For finishing, furnishing, lighting, and heating the unfinished part of the east wing of the main hospital edifice, $7,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Add as follows:

Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb: For the support of the institution, including $1,000 for books and illustrative apparatus, $25,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The first question recurred on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to reduce the appropriation to $12,500.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WELKER and Mr. SPALDING were appointed.

The House was again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 46.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

Add as follows:

For the proper inclosure, improvement, and enlargement of the grounds of the institution, in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, $5,600.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence, with an amendment, to reduce the appropriation to $3,600.

The amendment to the Senate amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Add as follows:

Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum: For the support of the asylum, over and above the probable amount which will be received from independent or pay patients, $15,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

Add as follows:

For the completion of the Providence Hospital in Washington city, District of Columbia, $30,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence, with the following proviso:

Provided, That the expenditures for said Providence Hospital under appropriations of Congress shall be made under the direction and control of the Surgeon General of the Army, whose duty it shall be to report at the December session of every Congress a full and complete statement of the expenses incurred under and by virtue of appropriations made by Congress.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and then the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

Add as follows:

For the National Soldiers, and Sailors' Orphan Home, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, $10,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

Add as follows:

For care, support, and medical treatment of sixty transient paupers, medical and surgical patients, in some proper medical institution in the city of Washington, under a contract to be formed with such institution, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend concurrence, with the following proviso:

Provided, That said contract shall be made by the Surgeon General of the Army, who shall report to the December session of every Congress, stating with whom said contract was made and the amount and nature thereof.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was then concurred in.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have modified it by leaving out the section in reference to the transfer of the property.

Mr. SPALDING. I hope it will not be adopted.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 49.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 87, nays 58, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Bojes, Boutwell, Bowen, Boyden, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Callis, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Culom, Delano, Dockery, Driggs, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Goss, Gravelly, Griswold, Halsey, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hill, Hinds, Hopkins, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Johnson, Judd, Kelley, Kellogg, Ketcham, Ladin, Lash, William Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Logan, Loughbridge, Marshall, McClurg, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Nunn, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Plants, Polesley, Pomroy, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Sypher, Taylor, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Van Wyck, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, William Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Baldwin, Beck, Blair, Boyer, Brooks, Broomall, Dawes, Dixon, Eckley, Eliot, Garfield, Getz, Goldaday, Grover, Haight, Haughey, Higby, Chester D. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Thomas L. Jones, Kelsey, Kerr, Knott, Koontz, Mallory, Maynard, McCullough, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Pierce, Pile, Poland, Randall, Kaum, Ross, Sitgreaves, Smith, Spaulding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Thomas, Lawrence S. Trimble, Upson, Van Anken, Van Trump, Windom, Wood, and Woodward—58.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bailey, Banks, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Burr, Roderick R. Butler, Calk, Cary, Chandler, Cornell, Dewesse, Dodge, Donnelly, Elia, Eldridge, Ferry, Finney, Fox, French, Glossbrenner, Harding, Heaton, Holman, Hooper, Asabel H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchin, George V. Lawrence, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Phelps, Pike, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Stone, Taffe, John Trimble, Twichell, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Woodbridge—71.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Senate also have amended the title by adding the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the title further by inserting the words "for charities."

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the Senate covers that. Besides, the amendment can be entertained only by unanimous consent, the previous question operating.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for a vote on the amendment to the title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPALDING moved to reconsider the vote by which the various amendments were concurred and non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress, with the following amendment, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House:

Strike out all of said resolution after the word "concurring," and insert the following:

That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives on Monday, the 27th day of July, at twelve o'clock meridian, adjourn their respective Houses until the third Monday of September; and on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska.

Also, that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

Also, that the Senate insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill

(H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions, agreed to the committee of conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Messrs. VAN WINKLE, RAMSEY, and FOWLER as conferees on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 161) in relation to the coast defense, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1376) for the relief of the loyal Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians; and

An act (H. R. No. 451) providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at St. Louis and Liberty, Missouri, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call up from the Speaker's table the resolution in relation to adjournment.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
July 22, 1868.

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the resolution of the House of Representatives fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress, with the following amendment:

Strike out all of said resolution after the word "concurring," and insert, "That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House, on Monday, the 27th day of July, at twelve o'clock meridian, adjourn their respective Houses until the third Monday of September; and on that day, unless it be then otherwise ordered by the two Houses, they further adjourn their respective Houses until the first Monday of December, 1868."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does it not require unanimous consent to bring this resolution up at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is privileged, and comes up whenever there is no other business before the House. Resolutions in regard to the adjournment of Congress are always regarded as privileged. That is the uniform practice.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that while this resolution does not meet with my entire concurrence, and is not what I would have liked, yet I think it will meet the concurrence of a majority of the House. If adopted I have no doubt that all the business will be finished by Saturday, and we will only keep in session till Monday for the purpose of having the President report the signing of some bills. If the resolution should be adopted the session will practically end on Saturday.

Mr. UPSON. How about the tax bill?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is signed.

Mr. UPSON. I understand it is not signed.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My friend from Illinois [Mr. COOK] has an election case pending, but he consented I should test the sense of the House upon this resolution. I do not feel, therefore, like yielding unless the majority of the House desire it.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman having made his remarks prevents anybody else from saying anything.

Mr. MILLER. I would inquire whether all the bills will be returned from the President by Monday?

Mr. LOGAN. We have the assurance that one of our most important bills has been signed already.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I was informed a moment ago by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that the tax bill was signed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say that nobody knows that it has been signed. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue was sent for to read it over with the Secretary of the Treasury, and that has led to an inference that it has been signed.

Mr. PAINE. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I yield one minute.

Mr. PAINE. There are two reasons why this amendment should not be adopted which are very weighty with me. I do not oppose that part of the resolution which provides for a meeting of Congress before the regular meeting in December, but I do object to that part which provides for a recess, and for two special reasons. In the first place the Committee on Reconstruction has authorized one of its members [Mr. BINGHAM] to report at the earliest moment a bill of the utmost importance in relation to Texas, Virginia, and Mississippi, and I believe it will be a crime for us to adjourn before that is acted upon.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman's time is out.

Mr. PAINE. I think my minute is not out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has spoken his minute.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Gentlemen ask me to postpone this matter until tomorrow. I only desire to say that we cannot suspend the rules until this resolution is passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Can we then? It will only be a recess.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is the question. The resolution is before the House, and members can dispose of it as they see fit.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, if this resolution passes, it will be in order to suspend the rules, as it provides for a recess, and not for an adjournment?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Perhaps it might be so construed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not so construe it. The rule states that the rules may be suspended during the last ten days of the session. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Except during the last ten days of the session the Speaker shall not entertain a motion to suspend the rules of the House at any time except on Monday of each week."

The SPEAKER. The last ten days of the second session of the Fortieth Congress will not have commenced if the House and the Senate take a recess until September.

Mr. MULLINS. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me one minute?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. No, sir; I demand the previous question, and the House can do as they please.

Mr. SCHENCK. Are all the other committees to be choked down in this way?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman can only be choked down by a majority of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the remark of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. I inquired whether the gentleman from Illinois intended that the rest of us shall not be permitted to state the condition of the business connected with other committees. I desired especially to call the attention of the House to the position of the funding bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to address a question to the Chair, and this is different from what he supposed it was.

Mr. SCHENCK. I had to address the Chair necessarily, but I was talking at the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] for a few minutes, and then to his colleague, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say that the Senate have disagreed to the amendments of the House to the funding bill, but have not asked for a committee of conference. This has been explained by the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate, and I have no doubt of a desire existing that the House shall ask for a committee of conference for certain reasons that have been mentioned, and we are considering whether it is not our duty to ask for a committee of conference on our part. If there should be a conference, it would, of course, take one day at least for its consideration.

So far as the tax bill is concerned, I think no man is authorized to say whether the message sent by the President on Monday that he had signed the tax bill was or was not consistent with the fact. The bill has been lying on the table of the President, as I am assured, and various statements have been made in regard to it, some of which can and some cannot be traced to him. It certainly has been a question of consideration with him whether or not on account of some of its provisions he ought or ought not to veto it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would like to state to the gentleman that a few moments ago I met Mr. Rollins, and he stated that the Secretary of the Treasury told him that the President had signed the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes; and a high official said the same thing the other day and afterward found out he was mistaken. This much is certain, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has been invited to read over the bill with the Secretary of the Treasury to-day.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to state the condition of business pertaining to the Committee on Military Affairs. Of course I do not expect at this late day that we can report several bills that the committee have authorized to be reported to the House, though they are very important.

But there is one bill to which I wish to call attention for one moment; and I shall feel it to be a public calamity if the House shall fail to act upon it. It is a bill now upon the Speaker's table, one upon which there has been substantially considerable debate in this House. One of its important sections has already passed the House in the form of a joint resolution. If that bill should pass it would probably reduce the expenses of the Army for the coming year $10,000,000; not so much as the expenses would be reduced by the bill of the House.

There is one section of the bill now upon the Speaker's table which, in my judgment, is of transcendent importance to this House. It provides that the newly reconstructed State governments shall be furnished by the Secretary of War with arms to a sufficient amount to enable the people of those States to protect themselves against the violence and outrage of the rebels there. As the theory of the reconstruction measures requires, we are withdrawing our military force from the control of those States. And if no provision is made we will have no control whatever over the rebel element in those States which have lately been reconstructed. The rebel element there has arms; but our friends have no arms. Whatever arms there are in those States are in the possession of the rebels.

Mr. ROSS. I rise to a question of order. The military bill is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I will say no more than that I desire to have that bill considered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not wish to say much in the two minutes allowed me, even if I could; and could not if I would. I desire merely to say that I am opposed to any adjournment of Congress until we take measures to make sure that we are not to go into the coming presidential election on a sort of "heads I win and tails you lose" principle of having the southern States counted against us if we lose them and not for us if we win them, as the other side propose to do.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not discussing the question before the House, but the next presidential election.

The SPEAKER. The subject of the presidential election is not now before the House. The gentleman must confine himself to the question before the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The question is whether we shall adjourn and go home. I am trying to give reasons why we should not do so.

The SPEAKER. If the point of order is raised, the Chair will be compelled to rule that gentlemen cannot discuss all the bills and measures that are or may be before the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to see quiet and safety secured in the South before I consent to go home.

Mr. RANDALL. You had better go home now; you have got glory enough.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is not in order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am quite sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania would have to remain here a long time to get himself in that condition.

I desire to say that until we can arrange matters here so that there can be safety for the Union men in the South, I am not for going home; that is the whole of it. We must take the best way to secure that object, and we should take a little time to find out that best way. If we can do so by supplying arms to protect Union men from rebels, then let us supply them. If it can be done only by removing the great obstruction to peace and quiet in the country, then let us stay here and do our duty in that respect. Let us do something or other, that our friends in the South may not day by day be murdered by the rebels there, as we have reports by every mail is now being done.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I now call the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MULLINS. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for two minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] for two minutes.

Mr. MULLINS. I think the gentleman has made a great mistake in not yielding to me.

Mr. WOOD. The question before the House is simply upon agreeing to the amendment made by the Senate to the resolution of the House fixing a time for the adjournment of Congress. The Senate has seen proper to amend the resolution of the House so as to provide for a recess, and the meeting of the two Houses of Congress again in September next. As one of the minority of this House, as a member of the great Democratic party of this country, nothing would delight me more, in a partisan sense, than to see this Congress in perpetual session. The responsibility is upon them; the omission and commission is altogether upon the Republican party of this country. And so long as they remain in session, so long, in my judgment, if they go on as they are now going on, they will fail to meet the responsibility now resting upon them.

But, sir, the people of this country require rest. They cannot have rest as long as Congress is in session. The people of this country require freedom for at least a short period for the purpose of collecting their judgment and making up their decision to be enunciated next November in the election of a President of the United States. Hence, while we ought to adjourn, we should not agree to meet here again in September. For what purpose is a meeting at this time proposed? To agitate, to excite the people, to arouse animosities and engender, if possible, hostilities in anticipation of the presidential election, and to involve this whole country a second time in revolution and war. Is this the object of the majority here? Do they see no hope of electing their candidate except by a resort to violence and force? Is that the object of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] proposing to distribute arms to the provisional Governors of the southern States?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLER. I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. Wood] will vote to continue the session in order to help his party.

Mr. WOOD. I will vote to adjourn sine die, that the country may have rest; that the people may have peace.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will in a moment demand the previous question; and the House can second it or not, as it may see proper. The majority of the House can second the demand for the previous question, and then pass or reject the resolution; or they can refuse to second the previous question and open the question to indefinite discussion.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment; to strike out Monday, the 27th, and insert Friday, the 31st, as the day for taking the recess?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot yield for that amendment.

Now, sir, looking at this matter as a practical question, let me say one word as to the business of the House. That gentlemen may determine whether it is necessary for the public interest that we should remain here any longer than Monday or even Saturday. All the appropriation bills have passed both Houses. The tax bill, I have every reason to believe, has been signed, and I have it from the most reliable authority that we shall not be kept here on account of the President declining to act on bills presented to him. Every political bill which he is not disposed to sign he will return with his veto before the time we propose to fix for the adjournment.

Mr. SPALDING. Has the gentleman had an interview with the President? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; but I have my information from reliable authority.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman name his authority?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My authority is good; and authority which the gentleman will not dispute.

Now, sir, the question is why should we stay here after Monday? Indeed, Senators have told me that if we would amend the resolution by fixing to-morrow or Saturday as the day of adjournment they will accept the amendment; that their reason for inserting Monday instead of Friday was that they did not fully understand the position of business in the House.

Mr. PAINE. I would like to know whether the gentleman's information as to the action of the Senate was derived from the same authority that informed him how the President would act? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It was not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Senate resolution should now be agreed to by the House, and a motion to reconsider entered and left pending, would it not be within the power of the House at any time before Monday noon to reconsider its action and prevent an adjournment?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As a matter of course that could be done.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, why can that not be done for the protection of the country, so that, if before Monday noon the important bills sent to him should not be returned with either his approval or disapproval, we may delay our adjournment so as to insure that those bills shall become laws?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know exactly to what bills the gentleman refers. We have already, in my judgment, done about all the business that is required to be done, or we can do it before the time fixed by the Senate. There may be a design on the part of some gentlemen to keep us here permanently—a design to enter again upon the impeachment of the President, as has been foreshadowed by my distinguished friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. Butler.] There may be a design to change all the issues before the country and to go into another impeachment trial, and keep us here during the whole summer. For one, sir, I say I am against that. I am almost prepared to say I am against this bill which is considered of so much importance by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. Paine.] I do not see any necessity for distributing arms to any State in the Union.

Mr. STOKES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PILE. I would like to know whether it is in order to discuss a bill before the House?

Mr. STOKES. I desire one moment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STOKES. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk a letter I received this morning from the adjutant general of Tennessee.

Mr. WOOD. I object.

Mr. STOKES. I ask it to be read as a part of my speech.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman has not the right to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The adjutant general of Tennessee cannot determine as to whether Congress shall adjourn or not.

Mr. WOOD. The letter has nothing to do with the matter.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield further to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do.

Mr. STOKES. I oppose the adjournment of the two Houses to December next. I am in favor of taking a recess whenever the business of the House and the Senate will justify it, and allow us to go to our homes. But, sir, the condition of things in Tennessee and in other States, I say to the gentleman from Illinois, and I say to this House, and I desire every member here to hear what I have to say; I say that the condition of things there is such that if this Congress adjourns without this Government appropriating arms to the Union men there to protect themselves, then the Ku-Klux-Klan will overrun those States. These rebels are already armed. They are already organized, and they will intimidate the Union men and the colored men, and they will not allow them to go to the polls. The war-cry has gone forth, and those rebels swear they will vote at the election in November regardless of our Constitution and laws. They say that they have the right to do it. They say the President's proclamation—

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. STOKES. I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not like to hear this.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide the point of order. The remarks of the gentleman are not out of order. The Chair will state that while it is not in order, upon the adjournment of Congress or the taking of a recess, to discuss any bill pending before Congress, or to discuss any election that is to occur, it is in order for the gentleman to state his opinion as to the condition of the country and as to whether it is wise or unwise to adjourn. Discussions of the military bill, the funding bill, or the presidential election are not in order. If they have everything would be in order on the question of adjournment or taking a recess; but the opinion of a member as to the condition of the country is in order on the question whether the House should or should not adjourn.

Mr. STOKES. I propose to read—

The SPEAKER. The opinion of some other person is not the opinion of the gentleman.

Mr. STOKES. I state it as a fact, to show the condition of things in Tennessee, and as a reason why this House ought not to adjourn until certain things are done. The facts are these—

Mr. RANDALL. I object to the letter being read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will see that if he can read the opinion of the adjutant general of Tennessee he can read the opinion of every one of the forty millions of people in America.

Mr. STOKES. I will express my own opinion, and my own opinion is, from the facts in my possession, and I am sure I am right, that unless this military bill is passed and arms given to the Union people of the South the Union people there, white and black, will be overrun. And it is the duty of Congress to remain here until this measure is put through. To day, sir, my people are expecting every moment when Forrest and his rebel Democratic crew will next make a raid upon them. We were entitled to ten thousand stand of arms and only drew two thousand. I want this House to remain in session until we can ascertain why it was that the demand of the Governor of the State of Tennessee for ten thousand arms was not complied with. We only received two thousand; eight thousand remain, and we to-day demand those eight thousand arms; and I tell this House that this is a matter of life and death. I am satisfied that at a very early day we shall need these arms. The rebels have determined that they will rule the country or they will exterminate the loyal white and colored people, and I propose to meet them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I resume the floor.

Mr. STOKES. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield and allow me to offer an amendment, which I have no doubt he will consent to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The House can vote down the previous question, which will bring the whole subject before it for discussion. I will say a word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Stokes,] and then insist upon a vote on seconding the previous question. I have no doubt of the grievous and terrible state of things existing in the South to which the gentleman refers, but the question is, and it is one of the gravest, I think, that was ever thrust upon us, whether that state of things is to be remedied by sending arms into those States? Sir, I believe that in most of the States it will not be ten days after your arms are sent there before they will be in the hands of the rebels to be used against loyal men.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order. I was stopped in discussing this question, and the gentleman is out of order if I was. The gentleman is discussing a bill that is before the House in relation to supplying arms to the States.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that there is no such bill before the House.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. There is a bill before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not argue the point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts had a right to appeal from the decision of the Chair when the Chair decided that the gentleman was out of order in discussing the presidential election.

Mr. BOYDEN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. STOKES. One single word. The gentleman from Illinois says it will not take ten days if these arms are sent before they will be taken from the colored people and put into the hands of rebels. I simply desire to state that the two thousand which we drew last year are in the hands of Union men.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That may be so in Tennessee. I did not allude to that State, but to the other southern States; and I tell gentlemen to beware before they press this measure, lest it should incite civil war and insurrection, and bring on the very state of things which you desire to prevent.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask for a ruling on my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from Illinois is discussing a bill which is not before the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BOYDEN] desires to say a few words, I will yield to him for a moment, and I think what he will say will fall with some weight upon the House.

Mr. BOYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am astonished at the ideas advanced in this House. I am alarmed at the condition of mind of gentlemen on this floor. Do they propose to send arms to North Carolina that we may get into a fight with each other? Great God! if we are on the eve of a conflict, keep away arms? Do nothing to irritate our people. Do everything in your power to assuage and heal the excitement that is abroad there. We want no arms. It would seem from what is said here that a conflict is just upon the eve of being engaged in, and you are to send us arms to fight it out. No, sir; I warn this House that if they do such a thing as that they will ruin us all. We cannot live there if you are about to send arms to enable us to fight each other. If anything is to be done in the way of arms, send the Army of the United States there. Do not arm neighbor against neighbor, and expect to have peace and good government under any such policy as that. There never was a more mischievous measure than this proposition to arm one part of our people against the other.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I make the same point of order that was made on other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The bill in regard to arming the States is not before the House.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire to say that the gentleman from North Carolina does not speak the sentiments of the South.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand a vote on seconding the previous question.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 91, noes 56.

Mr. RAUM and Mr. MILLER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GARFIELD and BOYDEN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 67.

So the previous question was seconded.

The question was upon ordering the main question to be now put.

Mr. MAYNARD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 80, nays 81, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ames, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boyden, Boyer, Brownell, Brooks, Broomall, Churchill, Reader W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Anderson, Bailey, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Burr, Cake, Cary, Chanler, Cornell, Dodge, Donnelly, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Halsey, Harding, Holman, Asabel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Julian, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Loughbridge, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Phelps, Price, Pruyn, Robinson, Norris, Peters, Shellabarger, Thaddeus Stevens, John Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Woodbridge—55.

So the House refused to order the main question.

Mr. PILE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope we will have an opportunity of amending the resolution.

The question was put on Mr. PILE's motion; and there were—ayes 63, noes 63.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, and the vote seconding the previous question is reconsidered, as it must have been if anything else was to be done, the House having refused to order the main question to be put.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the demand for the previous question in order to enable the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to make a motion to amend the resolution, and then he will call the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK took the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand the parliamentary rule to be that after the House has antagonized by its vote a position taken by the person in charge of a resolution or measure then he is not entitled to the floor as against other members.

The SPEAKER. That is true. And when the vote is taken again upon seconding the previous question that rule will apply, and not until then. The vote seconding the previous question having been reconsidered, the question recurs, "Will the House second the demand for the previous question?"

Mr. PILE. I desire to ask a parliamentary question. Will it be in order now to move to postpone the further consideration of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. It will not, because the demand for the previous question is now pending. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], who has possession of the floor, withdraws that demand, in order to allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to move an amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move to amend the amendment of the Senate, which provides for a recess, so that the reassembling of Congress shall be on the 14th of October instead of the third Monday, or the 21st, of September. And I will state my reason for that amendment. There seems to be a determination on the part of the House that if we leave here it shall be with an arrangement by which a meeting of Congress shall take place before December next. I desire that the meeting shall take place as soon as practicable after the elections in the three large States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana. If we meet on the 21st of September, under the provisions of the Senate amendment, then, as I understand it, if a quorum of both Houses does not appear the two Presiding Officers will be imperatively required to adjourn Congress until the first Monday of December next.

Now, if there be any purpose of mischief, any development of a spirit of violence in those States where we apprehend it may be manifested, it may very easily be suppressed in a great degree from motives of policy, and the hand of mischief not shown, until after the 21st of September. And if all be quiet and going on smoothly at that time you will not be able to get a quorum of either House, or at least of both Houses, to meet here at that time. In that case we will be powerless until the regular meeting of Congress in December next. But if we postpone the time of meeting until the middle of October, until after the elections in two or three important States shall have taken place, and there will by that time have been developed any purpose or temper and spirit of mischievous violence, or any thing of that kind in the southern States, then, my word for it, upon a manifestation of that sort, the people will require their Representatives and their Senators to be here, as they did upon one occasion before. For that reason, if we are to have a recess, I hope that recess will be prolonged until the 14th of October, two days after the elections are to take place in the three great States to which I have referred.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] what the Congress of the United States has to do with the elections in October next in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana?

Mr. SCHENCK. They have to do with those elections as facts; they have to do with them in this instance as connected with dates. It would be inconvenient for members to come here from three of the large States just upon the eve of the elections there, within a few days before. Arguing with reference to their convenience, therefore, I did not propose, as I otherwise might have done, that the reassembling of Congress should take place some time in the first week of October. Inasmuch, therefore, as for convenience sake it should be thrown beyond those elections, I would make it as soon after those elections as practicable. I have not spoken of the Congress of the United States as having anything to do with those elections.

Mr. WOOD. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to say that in case of any indication of a turbulent spirit in those States the people would demand of their representatives to meet here in October. Now, I desire the gentleman to tell us for what object the Congress of the United States can come here in October, in connection with the elections in those States?

Mr. SCHENCK. Does the gentleman refer to the southern States?

Mr. WOOD. No; to the other States.

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh, I have not been talking about them in any such connection. I have merely referred to the date of the elections as affecting the convenience of a meeting in October.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman has another motive.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is against the gentleman's friends, the Ku-Klux-Klan in the southern States, that we want to prepare.

Mr. WOOD. The gentleman is a revolutionist, and desires to adopt revolutionary measures.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have been speaking of our action as necessary for the protection of the disloyal States. We do not need any congressional measures of protection in Ohio. We will there take care of the gentleman's hybrid ticket without any difficulty.

Mr. WOOD. The people will take care of you.

Mr. SCHENCK. That ticket will be taken care of, I apprehend, in all the States I have named; but my reference to those States was merely with regard to the date of their elections as affecting the convenience of our meeting. They were not referred to in any other connection at all.

Mr. DEWESE. Mr. Speaker, I think that every man who loves his country should vote against this resolution. If this Congress adjourns without making some provision for sustaining the newly organized governments of the southern States, and protecting the loyal people there, the rebellion will be reestablished. The programme laid down in the letter of Mr. Blair, the candidate of the rebel Democracy for the Vice Presidency, will be carried out. In 1865 the rebel armies were disbanded and sent home carrying in their hands the arms they had used to shoot the supporters of this Congress; and if you expect us to maintain the governments you have established you must assist us in doing so. If you adjourn and go home, then before six months go round the last trace of republican governments in the South will have ceased to exist, and the Ku-Klux-Klan, the rebel, slave-holding Democratic party, will be ruling as they were in 1865.

Mr. WOODWARD. I beg leave to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. DEWESEE. Certainly.

Mr. WOODWARD. I beg to inquire whether the reconstructed governments of the South can be maintained in any other way than by the bayonet?

Mr. DEWESEE. They can, if you give us arms to keep down the rebels, and by no other means. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODWARD. Then, if I understand the gentleman, the governments which this Congress has been at such pains to reconstruct in those States can only exist by virtue of the bayonet.

Mr. DEWESEE. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that his State has arms; that his party in 1861 stole the arms that belonged to the Government of the United States to shoot their loyal neighbors' sons. Those guns are still in the hands of the slaveholding Democratic party.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether the militia of his State and all the arms in the State are not under the control of the Governor and Legislature of that State as now constituted, and whether the Governor and Legislature do not belong to his own party?

Mr. DEWESEE. We have no militia and no militia law as yet.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Then it is your own fault.

Mr. DEWESEE. Under the reign of the Democratic party, from 1861 to 1865, every musket, every shot-gun, every old horse-pistol was taken out of the hands of all men who were in the least degree loyal and put into the hands of southern sympathizers.

Mr. GETZ. Will the gentleman allow me a single remark?

Mr. DEWESEE. No, sir; I will not yield. I say that the support which is given to this proposition of adjournment on the Democratic side of this House is for the purpose of carrying out the Blair letter of the 3d of July, for the purpose of stamping out the loyal State governments of the South, and dispersing us "carpet-baggers." Now, I say to them, come on whenever you feel disposed to do so. Stretch forth your traitorous hands and touch one fold of the old flag, and the representatives of four million men, who, although black in skin, are yet white and loyal in heart, will throw themselves as a bulwark between you and these loyal governments, and you will live only in the sad memories of past events. Come on. I tell you this, you men who live in northern States, especially the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], that you know nothing about the condition of affairs among us. You know nothing of the persecution that the loyal men have to bear in the southern States. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] will go with me and stay three weeks I promise that he will come back one of the most radical members in this Congress. [Laughter.] I will tell him that down South they do not allow you to stay in the Democratic party unless you steal and rob, and I do not think he will do that. With us Democracy means treason, crime, bloodshed, and everything known to the criminal law.

Mr. GETZ. It does not mean that with us.

Mr. DEWESEE. I say to you this, that if you expect these governments to be a success you must, before you adjourn, do something to assist us. There is no danger in putting arms in the hands of the loyal men of the South.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman from North Carolina allow me to inquire whether these newly organized governments have had any arms issued to them?

Mr. DEWESEE. Not a single solitary pocket-pistol—not an arm. After the close of the war, under military orders issued from Washington city every old gun and every old pistol was "gobbled up"—that is, every one that could be found.

Mr. MAYNARD. When they are organized will they not be compelled to resort to the Federal Government for arms?

Mr. DEWESEE. Certainly they will. We have no arms, and we have no money with which to buy them. If we had the money to buy them we would not ask the Government for them. There is no danger in putting arms into the hands of loyal men.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How many Government troops are there in the gentleman's State now?

Mr. DEWESEE. I think about five hundred.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is all in that State.

Mr. DEWESEE. Under the instructions of the President of the United States since these governments have been reconstructed these troops have not been allowed to render us any assistance. Some of the officers have refused to turn over the offices to the newly elected officers. They have also applied for assistance, and were told that the officers had no authority to interfere. Our papers are full of proclamations and notices of men in reference to murders of loyal men. I say that if you want to sustain these newly organized governments you must give us assistance. We only want the arms sent to the State capitol, so our Governor can have them to use in case this rebel Democratic party attempts another rebellion. We do not wish them distributed and put in the hands of the people. Only give us the guns for use in case they are needed.

Mr. ROSS. Is there not danger that the Republicans will lose the elections there unless they get arms?

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to resume the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. Is there not danger of the Republicans losing their lives, white and black?

Mr. DEWESEE. Certainly there is if you allow the Democratic party to get into power again. The spirit that inaugurated the rebellion is as rampant to-day at the South as it was in 1860. Crushed by the Federal Army, until it became almost extinct, it has been gradually resuscitated under the fostering care of Andrew Johnson until it now stands defiant, threatening to involve the country in another war. The Democratic party of the North, under the leadership of such men as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WOODWARD], and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks], aided by their promises of help in fomenting the rebellion, and now they hold out to the defeated rebels the idea of obtaining control of the Government. How do they propose to do it? Why, by uprooting and destroying the loyal State governments established at the South under the reconstruction acts of Congress. The plan has been deliberately set forth by the Democratic candidate for the Vice Presidency. All that is needed now is the opportunity to execute it. The unrepentant traitors are preparing the way. The Democrats of this House want to put the loyal men of the South, white and black, in the same position that the traitors placed the Federal Government in 1860. When they are ready to strike us down they want to find us unarmed and unprepared, so that we may be the more easily overpowered. That is the secret of their opposition to the bill giving us arms. No sane man in this House or elsewhere believes that any danger would come to the peace and good order of the community by putting arms into the hands of loyal men.

My colleague [Mr. BOYDEN] talks wildly about the people using the arms against each other, and implores you to keep them away. "Do not," he exclaims, "arm neighbor against neighbor." Sir, who proposes to "arm neighbor against neighbor?" Certainly no man on this [Republican] side of the House. He knows as well as I do, or at least he should know, that in our State—and I presume it is so in others—the rebels are armed, while the Unionists are practically defenseless. Does he propose that this state of things shall remain? Does he want the rebels to do all the shooting and murdering, while the Union men submissively exclaim in his language, "Great God! we cannot afford to fight each other?" This is the only inference to be drawn from the gentleman's position on this question. The distribution of arms among the loyal men of the South will insure peace instead of producing bloodshed. When the rebels know that we have not only the will but the means to protect ourselves they will cease to harass and murder us. If there is to be any violation of the public peace it must come from them. There are no elements of disorder in our ranks. We want peace. But we cannot afford to leave ourselves in the power of our enemies. The rebels are as unscrupulous as they are treacherous. Those of us who know them best put the least confidence in their promises. We must have the means of securing good behavior on their part, whether they are willing or not.

My colleague [Mr. BOYDEN] talks about "irritating" these people. I think it is about time, sir, that we ceased consulting these rebels. They grow worse the more we endeavor to coax and please them. The only thing they fear or respect is the mailed hand of power. That is what created such a sudden overflowing of love in their breasts for Andrew Johnson. He is no better now than when they expressed their supreme contempt for him by calling him a "mean white." But now he sits at the dazzling height of power, and these rebels are the veriest sycophants at his footstool.

Mr. Speaker, the loyal men of the South are for peace. Those of you from the North were glad to welcome it when the rebellion formally closed. We of the South are still in the midst, I may say, of the conflict. If we are allowed to struggle on unaided, while our enemies and the enemies of liberty are backed by the whole power of the Administration, it requires no prophet to predict the result. Those State governments still feeble, and now menaced by the Executive and his party, will go down. The labors of those of us who have, as it were, passed through the fiery ordeal for the purpose of establishing those governments, will go for nothing. We ourselves will eventually be forced to leave the South and seek for more peaceful homes, and all because you will allow—

"Bloody treason to flourish o'er us," while you have the power to protect and save us. The work of reconstruction perfected by Congress in the admission of these States will become the failure the Democrats and rebels have hoped for; and worse than all the vantage ground gained from the common enemy, the enemy of the Government, of human rights and equal justice will be surrendered and the Union again imperiled. You owe it to yourselves, not less than to those who have held aloft the old flag in the South when it was worth a man's life to do so, that these State governments shall be protected. We do not ask a standing army. Give us the arms and we will organize a militia force that will maintain peace. That is what has saved Tennessee. It is the only thing to save the Carolinas and the other States recently admitted to representation in Congress from falling under the domination of the unrepentant rebels.

Mr. SCHENCK. This may be considered by some gentlemen as somewhat amusing, but it is really a serious matter. There is a Ku-Klux-Klan of rebels in the South. There is a majority of those who support these governments lawfully established under the legislation of Congress, white and black, but they are unarmed. It is to this condition of things we are referred. To say, therefore, an unarmed majority, a totally unarmed majority cannot sustain itself against an armed, vicious, excited, disloyal minority, is not an admission which need occasion any amusement. In several of the States of the Union the majority was controlled by having, as it were, the inside track. Otherwise we would not have had the rebellion. Virginia was carried out by a minority, Alabama was carried out by a minority, a minority of bad, disloyal, rebel men.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Allow me to suggest that I am told here that a minority in Tennessee and Missouri control the action of those States.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not believe it.

Mr. MULLINS. They did in carrying it into rebellion along with your party.

Mr. SCHENCK. Those who wish to believe such stories will give them ready credence, but it is not historical, and I advise the gentleman from Wisconsin to correct his knowledge on that subject by further reading, study, and examination.

Mr. Speaker, being under the impression that the elections in three of the principal States would take place on the 12th of October, I named the 14th in my amendment. I find on reference to the Calendar that I was mistaken by one day; that the elections in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana will be on the 13th. To avoid interfering, therefore, with those elections, I propose to select the Monday following, which will be the 19th. I modify my amendment accordingly by substituting for the 14th, Monday, the 19th of October.

Mr. MILLER. I hope the House will agree to that. It is much better.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now yield to my colleague, [Mr. DELANO.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague declines to speak with the hope that I will call the previous question. Before I do that I will indicate a further amendment. I do not wish to be understood, by fixing the time of meeting after the recess, as agreeing to the time when that recess is to begin. I think we ought to allow ourselves, for the reasons that have been indicated here, at least a week's longer time before we take the recess. I propose, therefore, to modify the amendment by inserting Friday, the 31st of July, instead of Monday, the 27th. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MILLER. Say Thursday.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a division on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. There will be a separate vote on each amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was on striking out "Monday, the 27th," and inserting "Friday, the 31st."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would like to know what business there is to keep us here till then?

The question being put on the amendment, there were—ayes 68, noes 83.

Mr. PAINE. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 92, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Boles, Boutwell, Bowen, Buckland, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, Deweese, Driggs, Farnsworth, French, Goss, Gravely, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hopkins, Hunter, Jenckes, Alexander H. Van Horn, Van Wyck, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, John T. Wilson, and Woodbridge—58.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 642) to amend the charter of the National Capital Insurance Company, in which he was directed to request the concurrence of the House.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the following bills of the House with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York, and one or more European ports; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President for the capture of Jefferson Davis.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 286) to incorporate the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America;

An act (S. No. 492) to extend the time for the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad, in the State of California;

An act (S. No. 357) to provide a temporary government for the Territory of Wyoming;

An act (S. No. 252) to create an additional land district in the State of Minnesota; and

An act (S. No. 481) to confirm the title to certain lands in the State of Nebraska.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution for the adjournment of Congress.

The question recurred on the second amendment of Mr. SCHENCK, to strike out "the 3d Monday of September," and insert "Monday, the 19th day of October."

The question was put; and there were—ayes thirty-eight, noes not counted.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. KELSEY demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 69, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Beck, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broome, Calkins, Reader W. Clarke, Cook, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, Getz, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Halsay, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Knott, Koontz, Laffin, Lincoln, Loan, Mallory, Marshall, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Nicholson, Orth, Perham, Peters, Pike, Pile, Plants, Poland, Pomerooy, Randall, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Aernam, Van Auken, Van Trump, Ward, Elish B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodward—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beatty, Benton, Blackburn, Boles, Bowen, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cullom, Deweese, Dockery, Eggleston, Ela, Eldridge, French, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goss, Gravely, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hinds, Hopkins, Alexander H. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, and Woodbridge—62.

So the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and I move to postpone the consideration of that motion until tomorrow immediately after the reading of the Journal; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to postpone was agreed to.

OBSTRUCTIONS IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the resolution of the House of the 14th instant, relative to the obstruction of the ship canal off Sandy Hook by the wreck of the steamship Scotland, and the best means to protect commerce from the dangers to which it is exposed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. As an appropriation has been made for this purpose in one of the appropriation bills which has passed, I move to lay the communication on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LIEUTENANT ROSWELL M. SHUTLIFF.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting all the papers on record in his Department relative to the case of Roswell M. Shurtliff, late first lieutenant ninety-ninth New York volunteers.

The letters and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee of Claims.

FORT LEAVENWORTH RESERVATION.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas. I ask unanimously to introduce for consideration at this time a bill which has received the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is a bill granting the right of way to certain railway companies over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections to its introduction at this time.

The first section of the bill provides for granting the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, to the Leavenworth and Des Moines Railway Company, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Missouri, to construct and operate a railway across the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth, on the east side of the Missouri, upon a line to be designated and fixed by the Secretary of War. The second section provides for granting the right of way, not exceeding one hundred feet in width, to the Leavenworth, Atchison, and Northwestern Railway Company, a corporation created under the laws of the State of Kansas, to construct and operate a railway across and over the military reserve at Fort Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, upon such line as shall be designated and fixed by the Secretary of War; provided that if the said company shall not construct, within one year from the passage of this act, a railway from the city of Leavenworth to the city of Atchison, then and in that case a like privilege shall be conferred upon any other company that shall construct a railway between said cities.

No objection was made, and the bill (H. R. No. 1447) was introduced, and read a first and second time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE TAX BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER. Before the House proceeds to consider the election case, the Chair desires to state what he did not state before, as he did not desire to influence the action of the House, that the tax bill has been signed by the President and filed by him in the State Department as the law of the land.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SCHENCK. By request of Mr. GRISWOLD, of New York, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I ask leave of absence for him for five weeks, beginning to-morrow.

There was no objection, and the leave was granted.

ELECTION CONTEST—HOGAN VS. PILE.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Hogan vs. Pile, from the first congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. COOK. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] is entitled to the floor for one hour to close the debate.

Mr. COOK. I yield thirty minutes to the sitting member, [Mr. PILE.]

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House for more than ten or fifteen minutes, as I desire to make merely a brief statement, not a speech, in explanation of two or three points in this case. First, with reference to the thirtieth precinct. It is claimed by the contestant that the vote of this election district should be rejected, for the reason that the judges of election did not use the certified list of voters made by the registering officer. The facts in relation to this district are as follows: under the law of the State of Missouri there was a supervisor of registration for each senatorial district. There were several election districts in every senatorial district, for each of which there was a registrar. The supervisor of registration and the registrars constituted a board of revision and appeal. The registry closed ten days before the election, after which this court of appeals met to revise the lists and take testimony in regard to voters objected to. This court for the senatorial district in which the thirtieth election district was situated, finally adjourned on Friday night, previous to the election on Tuesday. On Saturday the registration officer is required to deliver to the judges of election and to the county clerk a certified alphabetized list of the voters. After receiving the revised list, the judges of election of the thirtieth precinct, finding that it was imperfect, from the fact that it was only alphabetized to the first letter, on Monday, the first working day after they received it, and on Monday night preceding the election on Tuesday, made a copy of the list and alphabetized it perfectly. On the day of election they used that copy and the copy furnished by the registering officers. On this point I read the testimony of C. P. Gould, page 137 printed testimony:

"C. P. Gould was duly sworn as a witness on the part of General Pile, and testified as follows:

"Am fifty-nine years of age; am a carrier; and live at 2512 North Eleventh street. On the day of election I was acting as a clerk of the election at the thirtieth district; I was merely taking down the names of voters, and copying and numbering the ballots as they were put in. The books that were used there were the return books from the registrar, and they were copied on to other sheets and put in alphabetical order that we might find the names readily. These copies that we used corresponded in every particular with the lists that were furnished. Whenever we had occasion to examine them—that is, the names that we copied from the original return list from the registrar—I frequently compared them and found that they agreed in every particular. I had the original lists in my hands most of the day, and when there was occasion to refer to them I generally did it."

Also extract from testimony of Milton H. Wash, one of contestant's witnesses, page 57, printed testimony.

"Question. Was this certified list a correct one? [referring to list furnished by registering officer.]

"Answer. I presume it was not from the fact that there appeared to be some sixty odd names in the original list that were not found on the certified list.

"Question. Did you examine it yourself to see?

"Answer. I cannot say I examined it; they [i. e., the judges of election] were using it, and I could not get permission to examine it."

Two other witnesses swear distinctly to the same facts, and that the perfectly alphabetized list was used for the purpose of facilitating the voting, and four witnesses testify that the official returns were made up from the certified list furnished by the registrar. That certainly does not constitute any such violation of the law as would justify the rejection of this vote; it is no violation of the law at all. The rule is, as established by all legislative bodies of which I have any knowledge, that to reject an entire poll it must be either so tainted by fraud as to render it impossible to ascertain the truth and purge it from fraudulent votes, or there must be a substantive violation of the provisions of law. The election in the thirtieth precinct, as the facts are disclosed in the testimony, does not come within this rule, and therefore it cannot be rejected.

Now, with reference to the thirty-seventh precinct, which has been called in question, a sufficient answer to all that was said upon that subject, both in the speech of the contestant and in the report of the minority of the Committee of Elections, was made by the gentleman from Illinois who reported upon this case, [Mr. Cook.] And there is an additional answer, which would also be conclusive, and that is that the contestant set up nothing in his notice of contest in regard to this district until six months after the testimony in the case was closed. I had no notice that the election in that precinct was called in question, and had no opportunity to show by testimony that the registration was made. I affirm that I could show that this registration was made in the regular form, and that the only ground of objection was the neglect of the officer to return a certified list to the county clerk. The law simply provides that he shall return it "as soon as may be," without fixing any time. The only testimony with regard to the invalidity of the registry was that on the 1st day of January, immediately after the election, this return of the certified list had not been made. Upon testimony of that kind no vote in any precinct has ever in the history of this House, or any other legislative body, been rejected.

One word more with regard to the night vote.

In three precincts votes were polled after sundown. The way that occurred was this: just about the time for closing the polls in the twenty-sixth election precinct four prominent citizens of St. Louis, two belonging to the party to which I belong and two belonging to the party of the contestant, happened to meet at that precinct, and a conversation occurred between them as to the legality of a night vote. One of them, Hon. Samuel Knox, whom many gentlemen here will remember, gave it as his opinion that a night vote would be legal; and at the request of the judges of the election he went into the room and told them that he believed the law of the State of Missouri was not mandatory as to closing the polls at sundown; that votes received after sundown would be legal. Guided by his opinion the judges kept the polls open and received something over 200 votes. One hundred and forty-one were cast for me and 93 for the contestant, the night votes and the day votes being kept separate. These four gentlemen went immediately to the twenty-seventh and the twenty-eighth election precincts, and before arriving there the polls had been formally closed, and proclamation made to that effect. At their request, however, the polls were reopened to accommodate the crowd, who were clamorous to vote. There being only partial notice to the voters, and the polls having been formally closed, the decision of the judges of election and the clerk of the county court was that where the polls had been closed formally and by proclamation they could not legally be reopened, and that where they were kept continuously open, as in the twenty-sixth precinct, the vote cast after sundown was entitled to be counted. And that is the distinct and emphatic ground upon which was based the action of the judges of the election and of the county clerk with reference to the night vote.

Now, sir, a single remark further, and I shall have nothing more to say. The contestant closed his speech by a reference to the affidavits of eighty persons who he said had testified that they voted for him, while their votes are counted for me. These affidavits were taken a year after the testimony in this case was closed; but to preclude any impression either in this House or in my district that there was anything wrong in reference to this matter, and that these men were really cheated out of their votes by the judges of the election, I desire to make an explanation as to how this difficulty occurred, and how an equal number of men who voted for me are counted for the contestant, a list of whom with the same number of affidavits I can furnish. The law of the State of Missouri requires that the names of the voters shall be entered upon the poll-list when they come to vote, the names being numbered seriatim from the first to the last. The number prefixed to each man's name on the poll-list is entered upon the back of the ballot, so that under an order made by the court subsequent to an election directing the county clerk to make a certified copy of the numbers of the ballots cast for each candidate it can be ascertained, if the numbers are correctly entered, how each man voted.

These numbers upon the back of the ballot were made in pencil-marks by the judge of the election or by some of the clerks at the time. After the ballots were returned the county clerk in making out his certified list was unable in every case to decipher the numbers, and one number was sometimes mistaken for another. Eighty-nine was transferred to eighty-seven and eighty-three to eight-eight, it being difficult to distinguish between the seven and nine and the three and eight, one being mistaken for the other. From this statement it will be seen that wherever a mistake was made by the county clerk in the number on the back of the ballot that ballot would be traced to the wrong name on the poll-list, and might be found to be the name of a person who voted on the other side. In the case of my own ballot a mistake was made in deciphering the number, and on tracing it up the number that was deciphered showed that I had voted for the contestant, which, of course, was not the case. The mistake was made by the number upon the back of my ballot being indistinctly written. In each district there are from forty to sixty persons recorded as having voted both for myself and the contestant. There is also an equal number of names for which there are no correspondingly numbered ballots, showing conclusively that this was caused by the duplication of numbers.

The county clerk himself swears (see printed testimony) that it was impossible to decipher these numbers, and he had to guess and come as near the number as possible. The whole number of votes in each district, however, corresponds with the number of names upon the poll-book. So all there is in this accusation of fraud is that there was a mistake of the clerk, growing out of his inability to decipher the numbers upon the backs of the ballots.

It is conclusively shown by the testimony of the contestant's own witnesses that there was not a more orderly election held anywhere than in that district. They swear that it was conducted quietly and honestly, and that the universal desire was to give every man a fair chance to cast his vote.

If the gentleman who manages this case is ready to take the vote I have nothing further to say.

Mr. COOK. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, in the first instance, that the interest of the minority in the case was referred to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] During my absence he prepared a report, in which I concurred, by which report he made the majority of the contestant 73. On my return I gave the case such examination as I had the time and health to give it, and arrived at another conclusion, which is stated in what purports to be an additional report. I make it 67 majority for the contestant instead of 73. From the understanding we have had about the case I do not propose to make any argument about it.

Mr. COOK. I think there were some material errors made by my colleague on the committee in taking the figures from the brief rather than from personal examination. Votes were counted twice, and 129 in his statement should be 71.

The question first recurred on Mr. KERR's amendment, as follows:

Resolved, That John Hogan is duly elected a member of this House from the first district of Missouri.

Mr. KERR demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 91, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Delos R. Ashley, Beck, Boyer, Cary, Eldridge, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Hotchkiss, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Kerr, Knott, Mann, Marshall, McCullough, Mungen, Niblack, Nicholson, Randall, Ross, Sitgreaves, Stone, Tabor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Van Auker, Van Trump, and Woodward—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Arnold, Baldwin, Bank, Beatty, Benton, Blackburn, Blair, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Broomall, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Calk, Callis, Churchill, Reader, W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Cook, Corvode, Culom, Dawes, Dewesse, Dixon, Driggs, Ella, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Fields, Garfield, Halsey, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hinds, Hopkins, Hunter, Kelley, Kelsey, Koontz, Lash, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Mallory, Maynard, McClure, McKee, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Peters, Pierce, Plants, Poland, Polesley, Raun, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanks, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Sypher, Taffo, Taylor, Thomas, Twichell, Van Aernam, Bart Van Horn, Van Wyck, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, James F. Wilson, John F. Wilson, and Windom—91.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Brigham, Blaine, Boyden, Brownell, Brooks, Buckland, Burr, Chanler, Cornell, Delano, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Ferry, Finney, Fox, French, Goss, Gravely, Griswold, Harding, Hill, Holman, Hooper, Ashel W. Hubbard, Chester H. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Judd, Julian, Kellogg, Ketchum, Kitchen, Larkin, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Newcomb, Newsham, Norris, Phelps, Pike, Re, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Robertson, Robinson, Roots, Selye, Shellabarger, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, John Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Ward, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, William Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Wood, and Woodbridge—93.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. BOYDEN said: I ask to be excused from voting on this question. I know nothing about the case.

By unanimous consent the gentleman was excused.

The result having been announced as above the question recurred on the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee, as follows:

Resolved, That William A. Pike is duly elected a member of this House from the first district of the State of Missouri.

Mr. KERR. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The roll was partially called, when

Mr. KERR asked to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

No objection being made the call was accordingly withdrawn.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF A CONTESTANT.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee of Elections, reported the following resolution, and demanded the previous question thereon:

Resolved, That the sum of $2,500 be paid to John Hogan out of the contingent fund of the House, in full for his mileage and expenses incurred in contesting the seat of WILLIAM A. PIKE from the first district of Missouri.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COOK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House yesterday the contested-election cases must both be disposed of before proceeding to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. At my suggestion yesterday the House agreed to take up bills from the Speaker's table immediately after the election cases should be disposed of. We were a long time in getting at them to-day. It is now four o'clock, and the Utah election case remains to be disposed of. I hope, therefore, by unanimous consent, it will be agreed that we shall go to business on the Speaker's table to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal, or to-day after the remaining election case is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The first question after the reading of the Journal will be the motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendments to the concurrent resolution in relation to adjournment were adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Immediately, then, after that is disposed of.

Mr. BROOKS. Many members have gone away upon the presumption that the unanimous order of the House was to be followed. What is the understanding now?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The order of the House was that the Missouri and Utah contested-election cases were to be disposed of, and then that the House should proceed to business on the Speaker's table, but we shall not reach that business before the adjournment to-day. I propose therefore to dispose of the remaining election case this afternoon, and then to-morrow morning, immediately after disposing of the pending motion to reconsider the vote on the concurrent resolution in regard to adjournment, to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. SPALDING. Better take it up now.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We cannot take it up now.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object. Let us have an evening session and get through with the business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We have two days to do that in.

EVENING SESSION TO-NIGHT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that an evening session be ordered for to-night at half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In order to avoid a night session, I will move that the House take a recess till ten minutes before twelve o'clock to-morrow. We can get at the Speaker's table then.

The SPEAKER. The effect of that will probably be to throw over the motion to reconsider the vote on the resolution in regard to adjournment till Saturday. The House might take a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know why my colleague desires a night session.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Because all the time will be required to dispose of the business before the House.

Mr. PAINE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to take a recess till half past seven o'clock this evening.

The question being put; there were—ayes 50, noes 65.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for tellers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Now I hope my colleague will withdraw his objection, and that we shall agree to go to the business on the Speaker's table to-morrow.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I withdraw it.

Mr. PAINE. I renew it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move, then, that we may take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That will cut off action on the motion to reconsider the vote on adjournment.

The SPEAKER. No; because the House can then adjourn and meet again at twelve o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, I will agree to that, although I should prefer eleven o'clock.

Mr. SCHENCK. Oh, no; give us two hours.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. SCOFIELD. When is the recess to begin?

The SPEAKER. Whenever the House sees fit to take a recess this afternoon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. MUNGEN on account of feeble health, caused by a sun-stroke.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. UPSON on account of ill-health.

FUNDING THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Mr. DAWES obtained the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent that a conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the funding bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Would a motion to recede from our amendments be in order?

The SPEAKER. That would have priority. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I make that motion.

Mr. DAWES. Then I must resume the floor, for that will cause delay, and the understanding was that the Utah contested-election case should be disposed of to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I withdraw my motion in order that the gentleman from Ohio may ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask that a conference be requested on the disagreeing votes.

Mr. PIKE. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 174) for the relief of Mrs. Mary Wilson, of the State of Indiana, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 541, making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, and establishing additional regulations for the government of the institution, and for other purposes; and asked a committee of conference thereon, and had appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. PATTERSON of New Hampshire, and Mr. McDONALD of Arkansas, as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

COLUMBIA DEAF AND DUMB INSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER. The Senate has sent a message informing the House that it has disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 541, making appropriations for the service of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, &c., and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on that bill. If no objection is made, the request of the Senate will be granted.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. SPALDING of Ohio, Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois, and Mr. MARSHALL of Illinois.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. GRAVELY after to-morrow.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. HUBBARD, on account of the illness of his wife.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, on account of indisposition.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MILLER asked and obtained leave to print in the Globe some remarks upon the general political issues of the country.

Mr. BURLEIGH asked and obtained leave to print in the Globe some remarks upon the organization of Wyoming Territory.

[These speeches will be found in the Appendix.]

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1427) to establish certain post roads.

ELECTION CONTEST—M'GRORTY VS. HOOPER.

Mr. DAWES. I now call up the election-contest case from Utah, and I ask that the resolutions reported by the Committee of Elections may be read.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That William McGrorty is not entitled to a seat in this House, as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Resolved, That William H. Hooper is entitled to a seat in this House, as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Mr. DAWES. I propose to submit these resolutions to the House without debate. It is sufficient to say that the official canvass shows Mr. Hooper to have received 15,068 votes and the contestant 105 votes, and that no notice was given or any testimony taken in conformity with law. The committee have, nevertheless, patiently heard the contestant, but were unanimously of the opinion that he is not entitled to the seat.

The report in this case was prepared by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] who would have charge of the case at this time were he not detained from the House by sickness in his family. I am requested by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. UPSON,] the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. McCLEGG,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFFIELD,] my colleagues upon the Committee of Elections, to state that while they agree to the resolutions there is much in the views expressed by the gentleman from New York in his report to which they dissent, and I also desire to say that I join in that dissent. There are many papers also published in connection with the report that I supposed were not to be published.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the contestant, Mr. McGrorty. I do not know that he desires to occupy the whole of it; but at the conclusion of his speech I shall move the previous question on the first resolution and move to lay the second resolution upon the table.

Mr. M'GRORTY, (contestant.) I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to occupy the attention of the House for any great length of time. The question involved in this case is one of great national importance; it is one in which every living soul within the geographical lines of the Republic is interested. I desire particularly that members will give me that attention which the importance of the case demands.

On the 4th of February, 1867, an election was held in the Territory of Utah for the choice of a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States. William H. Hooper claims to hold that office, as the result of such election, by a vote of 15,068. William McGrorty, however, denies the legality of Hooper's election, and claims to be entitled to the office in question, as the recipient of 105 votes.

From Miscellaneous Documents No. 35, printed in the case, it appears that on the 23d of February, 1867, the contestant dispatched to both the sitting Delegate and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives notice of his (the contestant's) intention to contest the election of the sitting Delegate. The same document further shows, that on the 18th of January, 1868, this contestant sent the sitting Delegate another notice of his (the contestant's) intention to contest the election of the said sitting Delegate, accompanied by a written statement of seven exceptions and twelve specifications of illegality in the said election.

This contestant also presents as evidence in the case a number of affidavits, the depositions of George B. Smith and Mrs. Sarah E. Carmichael Williamson, with other written and printed matter. The contestant's notice, however, is alleged to be insufficient by the sitting Delegate, who claims by reason thereof to be exempt from all legal obligation to answer in the case.

The sitting Delegate, however, does not remain absent or silent, or content himself with a mere dilatory exception. On the contrary he appears, with his counsel, before the House Committee on Elections, there makes eleven elaborate exceptions ore tenus in bar and to the merits of the case, and argues them minutely. Still further, the sitting Delegate presents, by way of answer in writing, an elaborate, argumentative "statement of the positions relied upon by" him, containing these same eleven exceptions to the contestant's case, as it stands presented on the merits, including the unsworn written statements of four "men of character and position," as he describes them, whom he also names, and those "of forty-one citizens, not Mormons," less favored, it would seem, than the other four, but nevertheless leading merchants, bankers, and business men, as they are by him described, of Salt Lake City, to show that this "contestant could at any time since the" said election, have given his notice in full and "proceeded with his case in the manner prescribed by law, with entire and perfect safety to himself, without the least possible danger of personal violence; and who," according to the sitting Delegate, "state further that the fullest freedom and expression of opinion are indulged in and tolerated in the said Territory," &c.

This "statement" concludes with a challenge to match the people of Utah in devotion to that Government of which they form a part, (these are its very words,) representing them as persecuted and driven from their homes, misstates a certain order of the Federal Government in regard to Mormon troops as a call of the United States there engaged in a foreign war, exaggerates their former sufferings and privations, and grossly misrepresents the present population of Utah as more than one hundred thousand. This "statement" is not under oath, nor is it accompanied by any affidavit or deposition. Though extremely argumentative and diffuse, it is not in any part or manner fully and adequately responsive to this contestant's exceptions and depositions, nor is it even subscribed by the sitting Delegate. While it devolves upon him, therefore, all the burdens of the present case it is wholly insufficient to bar its legal responsibilities.

The first question, then, is whether this case can be maintained as it stands presented by this contestant. The original notice of February 23, 1867, is alleged to have been insufficient for want of the necessary specifications of exceptions. It will be perceived, however, (Mis. Doc., No. 35, page 3,) that this contestant gives his reasons under oath for this omission. And the sitting Delegate, while he affects to claim all the benefits of silence, interposes an inadequate denial, including a gross misrepresentation of several of the incidents of outrage in Utah detailed by the attorney of this contestant in his argument before the House Committee of Elections, and also the written statements, as they purport to be, of forty-one men, not Mormons, of Salt Lake City.

This contestant stated that the reasons which induced him to omit detailed specifications from the original notice of February 23, 1867, were the apprehension that the lives of himself and his friends would have been in constant danger after such detailed notice, and during the taking of the testimony and the prosecution of the contest; and to sustain his allegations thus made he instances a large number of outrages committed in Utah, "all of which," says the sitting Delegate, "occurred there by his (the contestant's) own showing from eight to fifteen years ago." (Exception ninth of Delegate's statement.) The gross error of such a representation as this is shown by the fact that the contestant's attorney says in his argument, since printed and laid before the House Committee of Elections, and in the hands of the sitting Delegate, it is submitted, when this statement was made and filed, (page 19 of printed argument,) the "killing of Squire Newton Brassfield, a highly respectable citizen of Austin, Nevada, who was shot down in the streets of Salt Lake City, in the company of the United States marshal," was on the 2d of April, 1865, (this is an error of the year; it was 1866,) and the assassination of Dr. J. K. Robinson, who had become involved in litigation with Salt Lake City, was "on the 22d of October, 1866." And on page 20 of his printed argument the contestant's attorney says: "The killing of the new prophet, Joseph Morris, with Banks and four women of his followers, who having resisted those seeking to arrest them were shot down in cold blood after surrendering," was June 13, 1862; "the killing of negro Tom, a Mormon, who was found in the outskirts of Salt Lake City with his throat cut from ear to ear," "was in the fall of 1866;" and (same page) "the murder of Isaac Potter and Charles Wilson, at Coalville," was "on the 2d of August last," 1867.

It will thus appear from simple collocation of dates that the four last cases of homicide referred to by this contestant's counsel were within two years from the date of that statement of the sitting Delegate; two of them within five months before, and one of them about six months after, the election in question. The homicide of Potter and Wilson occurred less than one year ago.

Several other cases of homicide have occurred in Salt Lake City and its vicinity, which might, but have not been mentioned by this contestant's counsel. The murder of Potter and Wilson, referred to page 20 of Judge Waite's printed argument, fully justifies this contestant, it is submitted, in declining to give a detailed notice of his intention to contest the election of the sitting Delegate, and impressively shows the extreme peril to which this contestant would have been exposed with his witnesses while in Utah, preparing the evidence of his case, and in the power of the Mormons, without the special protection of the Federal Government, which, however, was wholly unobtainable. A full report of the evidence taken on the primary hearing of that case is now before the House Committee of Elections. The whole annals of crime present no worse case of preconcerted, remorseless murder than that testimony conclusively exhibits.

But the fate of the witnesses in that case is what makes it an example of peculiar gravity to this contestant. Two of the twelve men committed, or rather ordered to be committed, for they were allowed by the Mormon marshal to go at large without any effort to restrain them, were sent from Salt Lake City to Coalville, charged by those who in Utah arrogate to themselves the arbitrary disposal of men's lives and fortunes, with the perpetration of the murder of Isaac Potter, Charles Wilson, and John Walker. One of these two was, or was reputed to be, a near connection and employé or partner in business of Daniel H. Wells, the lieutenant general and third president of the Mormons. The other one of these two, then, was or had been a policeman of Salt Lake City. These two men assured an aged resident of Coalville the day preceding the murder that they came there "to kill Potter, Wilson, and Walker," who was wounded but made his escape at the time. The old man, who was himself a Mormon, begged that he might not be required to testify in the case, as his own murder would be the certain consequence, and he was excused accordingly, as some others were for the same reason. Some of those, however, who were examined, undoubtedly caved under the same fearful apprehension. It is a significant fact that Avza Hinkley, one of the murderers thus permitted to escape, has since been appointed probate judge in the county in which the murder was committed.

John Walker, one of the intended victims, and an important witness on the primary hearing of the case, was severely wounded at the time Potter and Wilson fell, but escaped and made his way to the hospital at Camp Douglas, near Salt Lake City, where he remained till his recovery. After his discharge from the hospital at the camp, painfully impressed with his peril, and to divert his pursuers, he declared his intention to visit Malad City, Idaho. He actually went, however, to the house of an old and prominent Mormon, his former employer, a few miles from Salt Lake City, whither he was followed by several of the murderous band who had before attempted to take his life. These men were cautioned to leave by Walker's protector. Both he and Walker, however, were warned to quit the Territory, and threatened with death as the consequence of delay or refusal. They certainly started to do so; reliable information, however, impels the belief that John Walker was finally murdered in the West mountains, some twenty miles from Salt Lake City, and that his attempted protector is now a fugitive from Mormon vengeance in Nevada or California. Every witness for the prosecution of these murderers, without any known exception, it is submitted, was threatened with death, and subjected to a system of intimidation diabolical in its heartless cunning. Most of them fled from the Territory. These facts were made known to the United States judge of the district and his protection asked. With the best intentions, however, he was as powerless to protect the innocent as he was to punish the guilty, and so he as well as other Federal officers there must remain until the national Government shall sternly unmask and punish murder and polygamy, and disarm the fanatical despotism which now deals even unto death and ruinous spoliation with the lives, liberties, and property of the people of Utah. It may here be again mentioned, even at the expense of repetition, that Dr. J. King Robinson perished in consequence of his attempt to assert a legal right in the usual and proper way in the courts of Utah.

The moral or legal force of the cases thus presented by this contestant, it is submitted, is in no manner weakened by the statements of the four "men of character and position, residents of the said Territory Utah, and not members of the Mormon church," and "of forty-one other citizens, not Mormons, who are the leading merchants, bankers, and business men of Salt Lake City." The Governor of Utah refused to sign that paper when presented to him, and the most prominent man whose name appears appended to it has since declared that he never did or intended to sign any such declaration as that ascribed to him in the "statement of the sitting Delegate," now on file with the House Committee of Elections. Nowhere else are the arrogance of power and abject submission in such humiliating contrast as they now are in Utah. And without fear of error or of successful contradiction it may be said that every man who has signed the paper copied into the statement of the sitting Delegate has recently confessed it in the fullest possible manner. They are not the men to run the hazard of refusal in such a case. Experience shows that such declarations are easily obtained in Utah, even with the most lamentable disregard of truth and decency. And the sitting Delegate could have presented no more humiliating illustration of the despotism he claims to represent on this floor than the declaration in question.

The murder of Brassfield has already been referred to. That outrage was preceded and followed by the most brutal denunciations of all Gentiles by the Mormon leaders and expositors, then actually, or about to be, in session of their semi-annual conference in Salt Lake City. The military commander of that department cautioned Brigham Young by telegram against any more such assassinations. That priestly arbiter of men's lives and fortunes in Utah demanded of the Gentiles thus threatened and abused, over the dead body of their murdered brother Brassfield, a statement, for answer to the military telegram, that "human life and property" were then "as secure in Utah as in any part of the United States." And the men who responded to that demand and signed the statement of that day were, with perhaps a single exception, to be noticed further on as the same who subscribe the declaration copied into the statement of the sitting Delegate now on file with the House Committee of Elections.

About the same time a number of residents of Salt Lake City offered a reward for the apprehension of the murderer of Brassfield. This was eminently proper in itself. It roused the ire of the Mormon leaders, however; and some of the sitting Delegate's chosen forty-five, who had joined in this offer of reward, after a series of abusive threats for this interference with the rights of Mormon murder from the saintly leaders in the tabernacle and through their papers, the Daily Telegraph and Deseret News, humbly denied having anything to do with that offer of reward. Somewhat later in the same year nearly all the Gentile merchants in Salt Lake City, suffering from the abuse and threats of the Mormon leaders, and thereby deprived of the trade of the masses, combined in a written offer to sell out all their property, interests, and effects to their traducers and quit the Territory. This offer was fair, and fairly as well as courteously made. It angered the Mormon leaders, however, who increased the vehemence of their abuse. And many of these timid merchants retracted, in a written apology, the offer thus made to sell their effects. It is an instructive coincidence that those who did this are the leading merchants, bankers, and business men of Salt Lake City, who subscribe the declaration copied into the statement of the sitting Delegate on file in the present case.

Reference was made to one exception from the subscribers to the statement made at the time of Brassfield's death. That exception was S. P. McCurdy, described by the sitting Delegate as "late associate and now chief justice of Utah." (?) The judge was then terror-stricken by the Mormon threats and abuse of himself on account of his judgment upon a writ of habeas corpus, consigning the children of Mrs. Brassfield to herself and her husband, subsequently murdered. Such was then the judge's apprehension of threatened personal violence that he telegraphed for military protection. And the judge's dispatch, on file, doubtless, in the War Department, shows an estimate on that occasion of personal safety in Utah very different from what it was when he signed the declaration for the sitting Delegate to be used in the present case. The value of the judge's attestation may be further and finally illustrated by his call on Dr. Williamson, after leaving this city, with a request that the doctor would not permit his wife, Mrs. Sarah E. Carmichael Williamson, to depose concerning the Mormon endowment for the use of this contestant in the present case.

Many similar illustrations might be given, but these are sufficient; it is submitted to show the peril as well as the fear of conflict with Mormon prejudice in Utah.

This contestant claims no more than a layman's share of legal knowledge. He ventures, however, with becoming deference, but certainly not without confidence, to submit to this House, and especially to its professional members, as sound law, this proposition: that no man in a case like this is bound to exercise more than ordinary diligence, or to encounter more than ordinary risk in the assertion of either a legal or political right.

The law does not require a party to sacrifice his own life or the lives of his friends, or to run the hazard of a forlorn hope in the service of notice or in the preparation of his case. Where there is extraordinary peril he may wait until those who wield the public forces shall give him adequate protection.

This House will perceive that notice of any one of several, much more of all, of the contestant's exceptions would have exposed him to imminent danger had he remained in Utah after giving it. Such is his fourth exception (Mis. Doc. No. 35, page 1,) which reads as follows:

"Your oath, taken in passing through the endowment ceremony of the Mormon church, is incompatible with your duties as a Delegate in the Congress of the United States."

This denial, though addressed directly to the sitting Delegate, is indirectly an appeal touching the whole Mormon fraternity. Like all attempts to invade the penetralia of any secret society or system, it would have roused their direst vengeance. So it was with the Aelusinian and bacchanalian mysteries of ancient, and so it has been with all secret organizations of modern times. Over all such adjured pledges, as well as along the avenues and portals leading to and from them, may be seen in letters of flaming menace the terrible admonition, which Dante saw before one of the precincts of Hell: "Leave hope behind all ye who enter here!" There, and all round there, it is holy ground, which no uninitiated or recreant eye or foot may penetrate or enter—the penalty is death.

And the House, it is submitted, will not visit on this contestant, in the present case, the penalty of failure for his omission to include such exceptions in the original notice of February 23, 1867, while he was compelled to remain in Utah. The contestant, however, asks and submits that the House will receive the second amended and supplementary notice of January 18, 1868, (page 1 of Miscellaneous Documents, No. 35,) as supplying all possible omissions, and constituting full, valid, and complete notice in the case.

The decided cases, as the contestant is instructed, sustain him in this. The case of Williams vs. Sickels (Bartlett, page 288,) decided by this House in 1860, determines that the law of 1851 is not absolutely binding on the House, but a wholesome rule which may be departed from for good cause, and further time be granted to plead those that law prescribes. Later, in 1862, (Bartlett, 381,) this House also determined that where the grounds of exception were not specified in the petition or notice in writing, it may be done orally, for good cause, even after the time allowed by law. Also, that amendments are in the discretion of the House, in election cases, as they are in a court of law, regarding the pleadings. (Kline vs. Verree. See also the case of Kneass, 2 Parson's Select Cases, page 509; 1 Baldwin's Reports, 193, and Baily vs. Musgrove, 2 Sergeant & Rawle, 219.) Upon principle and precedent, as well as from the necessity of the case, this contestant, therefore, asks with deference, but with confidence, that the House will receive his two notices of February 23, 1867, and January 18, 1868, as one complete and sufficient notice, constituting an adequate pleading and valid presentation of the case.

This contestant is aware that his counsel, Judge Waite, in his printed argument, page 29, denies that the act of Congress of February 19, 1851, concerning contested-election cases, applies to the Territories or to this case. To the cases cited in that argument the contestant begs leave to add the case of Hunt vs. Palao, 4 Howard, 589, and Benner vs. Porter, 9 Howard, 235. Whether that act applies, or whether some other pleadings framed or adopted for the conduct of the case is to be the rule of procedure, the contestant submits that he is fairly entitled to the benefit of the conclusion before announced.

How stands the case as presented, then, by the contestant on the pleadings and the evidence? A similar effect, it is submitted, is to be ascribed by this House to the pleadings in the case as by a court of law to the pleadings in cases before it. There the pleadings on one side, when sufficient, are to be taken as admitted when not denied or avoided with equal certainty on the other. The sitting Delegate attempts to meet the pleadings, affidavits, and depositions of the contestant by a "statement" tautological, rambling, elaborate, argumentative, and confessedly to the merits, without, however, the oath or even the signature of the party producing it or any one for him. Informal, however, and wanting in sanction as is the sitting Delegate's statement or answer, as it purports to be, it is by no means responsive, fully responsive, to several material allegations in the contestant's exceptions. By the rule above announced all such material allegations as are left unanswered are to be taken as proved, or with the same effect, it is submitted, as if proved.

Such, it is submitted, are the one, two, three, four, ten, eleven, and twelve of the contestant's specifications, under his sixth exception, pages 1 and 2 of Miscellaneous Document No. 35. The House will perceive by inspection that these allegations charge want of legal competency in the voters; that the votes were cast not by the voters themselves whose ballots they purport to be, but by the judges of the elections, being also elders and bishops, the voters not knowing what was on the ballots which were voted; that the said election of the 4th of February, 1867, was under the control of men composing a secret religious and political organization, sworn to secrecy and co-operation and to eternal hostility to the people and Government of the United States; that those who voted for the contestant did so at the peril of their lives, and that many who would have voted for the contestant were deterred from doing so by the fear of personal violence; that votes were cast at said election by persons, by proxy, under twenty-one years of age, indiscriminately, the judges of election knowing them to be so, and that no objection was made although large numbers of such votes were cast, that aliens voted by proxy indiscriminately; and that the great body of the votes cast for him, the sitting Delegate, were those of unnaturalized persons; that votes were cast in favor of the sitting Delegate by the judges of election in behalf of large numbers of persons who never appeared at the polls.

Now, all the answer, or pretense of answer to this, contained in the statement of the sitting Delegate, is in his eighth objection, which is as follows, page 3:

"The returns of the election, as shown by the papers filed by the contestant, are made in strict conformity to the laws of the Territory."

The House will perceive, however, and the contestant begs it to note this well, that none of these allegations refers to the returns at all, not one of them. They do refer, however, to the absolute incompetency of the voters, the disloyalty of both the voters and those who conducted the election, and to the grossest disregard of all law as well as decency in the mode of conducting the election. This objection of the sitting Delegate may be true without impairing, in the slightest degree, the verity or the force of these allegations of this contestant, to which it is interposed.

By the rule before declared, which this contestant begs to submit with deference, but with confidence this House will accept as law, all this overwhelming mass of fatal allegation against the sitting Delegate which is thus left undenied and unavowed, is admitted to be true, with just the same effect as if fully and categorically proved. Taken as true it shows the whole vote of 15,068 claimed by the sitting delegate to be one mass of fetid illegality beyond the power of any known analysis to find in or extract from it a particle of legal soundness.

Votes may be illegal in any one or all of three ways; first, where the voter is without some necessary legal qualification; second, where the person voted for is without some necessary legal qualification; or third, where the votes are polled or returned without or against law. These suppositions exhaust all possible cases of illegality in voting. Examples under the first case would be, where the voter is a minor or infamous, or in some other way disqualified; under the second, where the candidate is an alien, a foreigner, or domestic enemy of the Government to which the office pertains, or otherwise disqualified to hold the office; under the third, where voting is by proxy, where the ballot is exposed, where the personnel of the election are wholly incompetent to receive or return the votes.

Any man wholly incompetent for any cause vitiates all votes cast for him. He himself cannot hold the office, and these votes counted cannot be counted for any one else. They are obviously, therefore, futile, null, and void. So votes cast by a person wholly incompetent, as by alienage, treason, or fanatical hostility to the Government, are obviously null and void. Votes are also null and void where the law is violated or disregarded in polling or returning them. The causes of nullity in the conduct of an election are of course numerous. The positive breach or the omission of any necessary legal requisite in polling or returning votes, renders them null and void.

The illegality of all such votes is as clearly shown by this statement as by any reasoning of which the case is susceptible. This House has already determined that where the secrecy of the ballot is violated it vitiates the vote and renders it illegal. Easton vs. Scott, Delegate of Missouri Territory, 1816. (Clarke and Hall, Contested-Election Cases, p. 272.) Such, too, was the determination of this House in the case of Washburn vs. Ripley, decided in 1830. (Clarke and Hall, Contested-Election Cases, p. 679.) Such, too, was the determination of this House in the case of Otero vs. Gallegos, Delegate of New Mexico in 1856. (Bartlett, Contested-Election Cases, p. 177.)

This House also decided in the case of Washburn vs. Ripley that the intention of the voter is to be ascertained from the box in which his ticket is deposited. (Ibid.) The last decision is of direct application to Utah. There the voter provides his own ticket, the judge must number and put it in the box. The clerk shall then write the name of the elector and opposite it the number of the vote. Thus it is shown that even in Utah the intention of the voter can only be ascertained from the box in which the votes are deposited. Any attempt to scrutinize the ticket before it is deposited in the box, renders the ticket futile and so far vitiates the election. This was done in regard to Mormon votes in Utah by the Mormon election officers acting in the interests of the sitting Delegate. And to that extent the election of the sitting Delegate was vitiated.

The law of confusion, this contestant is instructed and submits, applies directly to voting and to votes. That law obviously sustains the following proposition: if spurious or illegal votes are so mingled with legal votes as that the number of either cannot be ascertained the whole mass is rendered spurious and illegal, and must be disregarded. More especially is this true when the confusion results from the act of the person claiming the benefit of the mixed mass or those in his interest or favor. This proposition the contestant submits to the favorable consideration of this House. The confusion is alleged under the sixth exception of the contestant, and not denied by the sitting Delegate. By the rule of pleading before stated by the contestant it must, therefore, be taken as admitted. And it shows the mass of the votes for the sitting Delegate, both legal and illegal, to be so combined that by no known process can they be separated and the number of each ascertained.

The whole of the votes of the sitting Delegate are thus, it is submitted, annulled, and ought to be rejected. The contestant in his first three exceptions alleges of the sitting Delegate that he does not represent any constituent part of the community of the United States, but a separate and distinct community under a different government, not republican in form; that he does not represent a loyal or law-abiding people, but one hostile to the American Government, and seeking its overthrow; and that he does represent a people hostile to and endeavoring to undermine and destroy the monogamic family system, which lies at the foundation of republican institutions.

All this, too, is left unanswered, and must, therefore, be taken to be admitted by the sitting Delegate. The contestant, therefore, submits that he is entitled to the same judgment upon it as if it were fully and fairly proved.

Without discussing this portion of the subject at large the question may be asked, is any community, or that portion of it which is in the condition represented in the exceptions last above cited, fitted or entitled to the choice of Delegate? Is any Delegate chosen by such a people entitled to hold his seat against one chosen by the loyal portion of the same community? This contestant submits that he is entitled to the judgment of this House in the negative upon these questions.

This contestant now comes to his fourth exception, which reads as follows:

"4. Your oath, taken in passing through the endowment ceremony of the Mormon church, is incompatible with your duties as a Delegate in the Congress of the United States."

The sitting Delegate denies this exception in his answer, informally, but still sufficiently to constitute an issue. This, therefore, presents a case for proof. The proofs are produced by the contestant, and the judgment of this House is respectfully asked on the issue and the proofs thus presented. The evidence upon this portion of the case consists of the depositions of George B. Smith and of Mrs. Sarah E. Carmichael Williamson. Some other written materials are also produced on the same subject, which are commended to the careful consideration of this House. This part of the case the contestant, however, submits may be safely rested on these depositions alone. They were taken at Chicago, Illinois, and at Hamilton, Ohio, on fourteen and fifteen days' notice. Neither the sufficiency of the notice nor the validity of the execution is questioned.

The sitting Delegate, however, in his fifth objection, says of himself:

"He [the Delegate] did not appear to cross-examine, because an appearance would have been a recognition of the illegal proceeding, which would have committed him to a defense before the committee."

The sitting Delegate, therefore, comes to the complacent conclusion that the notice being insufficient all proceedings under it fail, notwithstanding his elaborate answer. This conclusion of the sitting Delegate is certainly quite as remarkable as the reasons offered for it. The Delegate, this contestant submits, might with perfect safety have appeared and cross-examined Mr. Smith and Mrs. Williamson under protest or with a reservation to himself of all rights of objection, not only to the depositions themselves, but to the whole case. He might thus have secured to himself all the benefits of a cross-examination and impaired no defensive right.

This testimony, therefore, the contestant submits, is competent and fairly in the case, and the judgment of this House will determine the credit and legal effect to be ascribed to it. Both the witnesses, George B. Smith and Sarah E. Carmichael Williamson, are of full age and obviously intelligent, generally and particularly, on the subject of the testimony. Mrs. Williamson, indeed, is a person of rare genius. Her volume of published poems place her among the first, if not the very first, poetical writers of the present age in this or any other country. Her eulogy on President Lincoln is absolutely unrivaled in its kind. Such are these witnesses.

This contestant is informed, and submits, that swearing under conditions which are against the interests or the safety of the witness is one of the most powerful tests known to the law, not only of the credibility but even of the competency of the witness. Both these witnesses swear they are subject to the penalty of death for revealing the secrets of the endowment and testifying as they have done in the present case. Mr. Smith was endowed in 1857, at the age of about thirty, after having been a member of the Mormon church some eight months. Mrs. Williamson was endowed in 1859, when about twenty years of age, after a membership of twelve years in the Mormon church. Both witnesses testify that the endowment pledges were made under the most terrible oaths and imprecations. One of these was the death of the subject for revealing any of these pledges. Mr. Smith says he took oaths, four or more. Mrs. Williamson says she took oaths, several of them, she cannot tell how many, while passing under the endowment. Mr. Smith says: "I think there was only one of these oaths, the second or third, which had anything to do with his relations to the people or Government of the United States." Mrs. Williamson says there were two oaths which she considered antagonistic to the people and Government of the United States.

Mr. Smith says in answer to question fifteen: "The substance of the oath as I remember it: 'That you (he) will hate the United States Government; that you (he) will do all in your power to overthrow it, teach the same to your children and impress it on your dying bed.'"

Mrs. Williams says of these oaths:

"One required unquestioning obedience to the head of the Mormon church as God's representative, making the authority of the priesthood paramount. The other required a formal renunciation of allegiance to the United States Government, and hostility thereto as a Power, held responsible for the persecution of the saints, spilling the blood of the prophets," &c.

Both these witnesses say that all members in good standing are expected to go through these ceremonies and take these endowment oaths. They also both testify that all church members appointed to do church business of the most trivial kind are required to receive these endowments before leaving the Territory. Both testify that Mr. Hooper is an elder in the Mormon church, and are, as they swear, sure that he has assumed the endowment pledges above described.

Besides the evidence of these witnesses, this contestant has laid before the House the historical works of Hyde and Ferris on the subject of Mormonism, and the Journal of Discourses printed by authority of the Mormon church. Historical works are evidence of past and even of current transactions, and as such these are presented to this House.

The Journal of Discourses is, however, of peculiar value in the case. It is the Mormon statement of Mormons and Mormonism by themselves, and as men are always known to speak of themselves as well as they deserve, its statements are commended to the House. The Journal speaks of Mr. Hooper as an elder. Mr. Hyde describes the endowment in the same manner as Mr. Smith and Mrs. Williamson, and all of them testify that elders in the Mormon church receive the endowment.

This testimony shows that the sitting Delegate, William H. Hooper, has taken the pledges thus shown to be hostile to the people and Government of the United States, and that he must stand or fall by their consequences. The testimony thus produced is the best of which the nature of the case admits. The pledges of all secret societies, which are against the public and Government amid and under which they exist, are necessarily secret. Such pledges are invariably verbal, and are not permitted to be written or printed lest they be exposed. They are made in darkness and in close recesses, into which no uninitiated eye or ear can ever penetrate. And when these secret pledges are thus made the penalty for revealing or exposing them is death.

Such are the pledges shown to have been assumed by the sitting Delegate. And it must be obvious to this House that in their very nature they are not susceptible of direct proof. Indirect proof, such as this contestant has adduced, is the best of which the nature of the case under inquiry admits. The law does not require impossibilities. This contestant believes and submits, for instance, that in a conspiracy, which is nearly always secret, the intermingling of the very breath of the conspirators need not be proved. In adultery the fact of coition need not be proved. In all such cases the party is required to prove such circumstances, such indirect facts as the nature of the case admits. Such are the proofs presented in the present case, and they are all the case allows.

The House is asked to note well the nature of this endowment pledge in connection with the question of proof. These pledges are assumed in profound and impenetrable secrecy. Such is the proof offered, and such, too, is its obvious essential nature. Have the Mormons or anybody else ever pledged themselves to hostility against their Government and their country openly, ostensibly, or in any other manner susceptible of direct proof? None but Mormons in good standing, who surrender themselves absolutely to the system, accustomed to impenetrable secrecy and to the arts of evasion, are allowed to assume this pledge. And it is always assumed amid the most horrid oaths and imprecations:

"A death penalty is attached to the violation of all oaths taken in the endowment ceremony, and one of the oaths requires that the secrets of the endowment be kept inviolate. These penalties are expressed in pantomime by motions of stabbing through the heart, cutting the throat, disemboweling," &c.

Can this House require the contestant to show by the very witness, if any such there ever was, who saw the sitting Delegate assume these pledges? Or can it upon established principles of law or common sense require better or other testimony than that which is presented in the case by the contestant? This contestant, therefore, submits to the House that he has proved by the best testimony the nature of the case admits that the sitting Delegate—

"Has abjured his allegiance to the United States, that he has pledged himself to hostility against the Government and people, and that he has bound himself to avenge the death of the saints upon them; to teach the same obligations to his children and impress them on his dying bed."

The two witnesses examined speak from memory only. The oath they never saw, for such things never are written or printed. They are impressed no where but upon the human heart, in characters of envenomed hate as enduring as itself. Each of these witnesses speaks a little more fully than the other on some particular points. The absolute test of verity, substantial agreement with circumstantial diversity, characterizes the statements of these witnesses. These witnesses agree that the sitting Delegate has abjured his allegiance and pledged himself in active hostility to the United States. Still it may be said that the sitting Delegate has sworn his allegiance here to the United States, and that the endowment pledge is part of his religion and not to be called into question. Can any one believe that pledges, imprecations, adjurations, such as have been proved, are able to be retracted or released by any other sanctions or retractions whatever? Grant, arguendo, that it is a part of the fanaticism or religion of the Mormon people. It then pertains to his hope of happiness here and of his salvation hereafter. It is then a question between the conscience of the sitting Delegate and his God which no oath sworn here can ever reach or retract.

If this be so then you have in your midst as the sitting Delegate from Utah one who has abjured his allegiance to the United States and pledged himself to active hostility against them, by irrevocable sanctions, and yet he claims to sit here as one of the council of that country whose sworn foe he has thus become. Is this a part of the religion of the sitting Delegate, and therefore not to be called in question here? Can this House admit such a proposition as that? It has been so claimed by and on behalf of the Mormons in regard to polygamy and murder among them. But can this House adopt as a practical rule the proposition that disloyalty, sedition, treasonable pledges, impurity, and crime are susceptible of being so clothed in the forms and sanctities of religion as to be not only beyond its investigation, but that the man who comes here as the sitting Delegate, robed in the infamy of such a livery as that, may, forsooth, maintain his place in this Hall beyond all the power of this House to displace him because he has made these crimes a part of his religion?

Grant the affirmative of this to be true, and what follows as a practical proposition not to be denied? Just this, that any band of traitors, murderers, seditionists, adulterers, polygamists, conspirators, or what not, may first combine and establish a religion of which these crimes form a part, and then go on and revel in such crimes on any part of the soil of the United States because its Constitution places religion beyond inquiry by the Federal Government? Does the Constitution thus confound religion and crime? Murder, polygamy, treason, sedition were as well known to the framers of the Federal Constitution to be crimes and criminal offenses as the Christian religion was known to them to be the common faith in every State in the Union, and indeed in every civilized country. Can this House believe that any intention to confound them entered into the formation of the Constitution? If Mormon polygamy, Mormon murders, and Mormon sedition are protected from inquiry by the Constitution of the United States, then that venerated code of fundamental law must make religion synonymous with crime. The contestant submits with confidence that this House never will adopt that proposition as a practical rule, nor any one approximating to it.

It may be submitted, perhaps, as a fundamental rule of action, hardly deniable that no human government can subsist unless those who hold its offices and wield its forces are in absolute allegiance and fidelity to, and in perfect peace and amity of sentiment with the government itself. Governments can subsist on no other terms. The practical application of the above proposition is submitted as equally true, that no man ought to be permitted to hold office under any Government unless he maintains his allegiance and fidelity to, and absolute peace and amity of sentiment with such Government. In the absence of these essential qualifications no form or sanction of election or choice can render any man competent to administer any Government function. Wanting these qualifications such a man ought to be expelled from the councils of the country.

This contestant now, therefore, submits to the House that he has shown the sitting Delegate to have abjured his allegiance and pledged himself in active hostility to the Government of the United States, by fanciful pledges so overwhelming in the obligation with which they were accepted, that no official or secular oath can retract or loose them; and that he was in that condition when he was elected, as he claims to have been, to this House. He also submits to this House that this condition annulled the 15,068 votes which the sitting Delegate claims to have received; renders them wholly futile, and deprives his election of all validity. The sitting Delegate cannot and ought not, therefore, to hold the office he now claims to hold under any form or sanction of choice.

The contestant has already submitted that all votes polled for any man incompetent or disqualified for the office of choice are wholly illegal, and the election void. No vote, no possible majority, can elect any man to an office under this Government who has thrown off his allegiance and sworn hostility to it. The sitting Delegate is in that condition, and he ought not, therefore, to hold the office.

This contestant has also submitted that all votes polled by incompetent persons are illegal, null, and void. Exceptions two and three (page 1, Miscellaneous Document, No. 35) of this contestant allege that the votes polled for the sitting Delegate were by persons disloyal and hostile to the United States. These allegations the sitting Delegate does not effectually deny in his statement or answer. They must therefore be taken as admitted.

The testimony in the case also shows the Mormon people to be disloyal and hostile to the United States. They are, therefore, by what has been shown, incapable of electing any person to office under the Government of the United States. This contestant, therefore, submits to the House that the sitting Delegate, by his own incompetency, as well as by the incompetency of his voters, is absolutely disqualified to hold his present seat. The 15,068 votes he claims to have received cannot avail him. He cannot hold the office. And the resolution of this House in the present case ought to be that the sitting Delegate, William H. Hooper, is not entitled to his present seat in the Fortieth Congress.

The next question is, was the contestant elected at the election of the 4th of February, 1867, at which the sitting Delegate claims to have been chosen. For the contestant there were returned 105 votes. The competency of those who voted and the validity of the votes for the contestant have not been questioned or denied. They were, therefore, able to, and did, make a legal choice of this contestant at that election, if the opposing candidate and voters were illegal and incompetent by reason of their disloyalty and hostility to the Government of the United States. It has been shown, both by the pleadings and the evidence in the case, that such was the condition of the sitting Delegate and his voters at the time of the election in question.

It has been claimed, as this contestant believes, that the minority cannot represent the majority. That may be true where the majority is in entire harmony and amity with its Government and entitled to representation. But where such majority casts off its allegiance and swears hostility to the Government of the United States, however large, it cannot and ought not to deprive the loyal and faithful minority, however small, of its rights of representation.

The contestant submits but one precedent on this point. It is, however, of Divine authority, and therefore binding on all, whether lawyers or laymen. It is found in chapter eighteen of Genesis, where it is related of Abraham communing with the angels concerning Sodom and Gomorrah, as follows:

"And Abraham drew near and said, Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? And he said, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak yet but this once: Peradventure ten [righteous persons] shall be found here. And he said I will not destroy it for ten's sake."—V. 32.

This is a most instructive case and worthy the gravest consideration of this House.

Without further argument or citation this contestant submits that he was duly chosen at the election in question on the 4th of February, 1867. And the resolution of the House in the present case ought to be that the contestant, William McGrorty, is entitled to the seat in the House of Representatives of the Fortieth Congress of the United States as Delegate from Utah, under the election of February 4, 1867.

Beyond the immediate controversy of the present case there are, as this contestant submits, other very grave questions, which demand the immediate action of this House, however the main controversy may be determined. Full evidence has, in times past, been submitted to different Departments of the Government of the crime and impurity existing in Utah, and it has elicited animadversion in various forms and degrees. And still the evils continue.

The testimony of the present case, however, brings the condition of Utah more fully and significantly before this House than it had ever been previously presented to any Department of this Government. The existence of polygamy in Utah is not denied. With blasphemous effrontery, however, it is claimed to be sustained by the sanctities of religion, and its practice enjoined by the Mormon leaders upon their followers in direct violation of the act of Congress to the contrary.

The report of Colonel Carleton, filed in the present case directs the attention of this House to the Mountain Meadow massacre, and with all other evidence on the subject traces that outrage to the Mormons. It even places the sitting Delegate in grave complicity with some of the consequences, if not with the crime itself. He was found associated in some measure with John D. Lee, who is designated by every indication as the leader in that massacre, and it appears that he was found selling two hundred and forty-eight head of live stock taken from those murdered at the Mountain Meadow not long after that atrocity. The sitting Delegate will doubtless be able, and ought promptly to be required to explain, how in a country such as Utah, by no means overrun with cattle, and with an efficient system of branding and marking, he could innocently be found in possession of so much property of plundered and murdered people. The magnitude of this fact cannot be explained by trifling evasions.

All the evidence, as already stated, indicate that John D. Lee, then, as now, an adopted son of Brigham Young, and a Mormon bishop, was the leader in that nefarious crime. The large property of the victims, consisting of carriages, wagons, horses, mules, oxen, furniture, store goods, wearing apparel, money, jewelry, books, musical instruments, arms, and other effects of a body of wealthy emigrants, worth as variously reported, from one to two hundred thousand dollars, was appropriated by the Mormons, chiefly by the leaders. Other parts of the country were shocked by this atrocity and loudly condemned it. For many months the Mormon papers never alluded to the massacre, and then only to traduce the victims. In Utah, among the Mormons, the guilty authorship of this outrage is not denied. Participation in the massacre is frequently characterized by the Mormons as a "service," and in their quarrels they not unfrequently twit each other with it.

The Mountain Meadow massacre is perhaps unparalleled in cruelty and impunity. More than one hundred and twenty persons were by it swept into eternity, leaving fifteen or twenty children, so young as not to know their own names or those of their parents. Matrons, defended by all the dignity and charms of their sex; girls, still lovely with the tender innocence of childhood, were first subjected to that fate which is the most revolting to humanity, whose further mention, however, would suffuse the cheek of modesty with the blush of shame, and then remorselessly butchered while invoking death for themselves, but pleading with angelic eloquence for their husbands, their fathers, mothers, brothers, and sisters.

The evidence is believed and submitted will show that this is no fancy sketch, but the terrible truth. One boy was killed by having his head cleaved with an ax some days after the massacre, because he was found to be old enough to identify his father's oxen. Treachery was employed against the emigrants. The spring which supplied them with water was furtively seized by men in the disguise of Indians, in the hope of reducing the emigrants by thirst. Subsequently the disguise was thrown off, and these emigrants, after a brave defense, were induced to surrender their arms to the Mormons, under promise of protection from the Indians. The work of massacre was then easy.

The children saved were so utterly bereft of all relations of kindred, as well as of individuality, that the very names since given them express their miserable condition. One of these, for instance, is Calvin Sorrow. These poor orphans, naked and destitute, as they were born, were permitted to depart from the Territory of Utah without the offer of a dollar, so far as is known, for their relief, while the abundant property of their fathers remains with their Mormon murderers, who will doubtless raise the cry of persecution for this attempt to interfere with the rights of Mormon murderers.

It is now eleven years since this most atrocious crime was perpetrated. Its perpetrators, red with the blood and gorged with the wealth of the murdered victims, walk unpunished as offensive to the eye of decency as to that of justice. Nay, more; it is possible they mean to invade this Hall of legislation! The evidence of this crime is fast passing away, and if the apathy of this Government continues, it will soon leave these murderers to an impunity as entire and absolute as its own responsibility for justice disregarded.

The next case which this contestant presents, with a few words of necessary explanation, but without comment, is the Mormon order to murder some eighty poor, unarmed teamsters, discharged from Fort Bridger, and making their way home by way of Salt Lake City, to and through California, in the fall, winter, and spring of 1857-58. The order speaks for itself, and is as follows:

[Special Order.]

SALT LAKE CITY, April 9, 1858.

The officer in command of escort is hereby ordered to see that every man is well supplied with ammunition and have it ready at the time you see those teamsters a hundred miles from the settlements. President Young advises that they should be all killed to prevent them returning to Bridger to join our enemies. Every precaution should be taken and see that not one escapes. Secrecy is required.

By order of General Daniel H. Wells:

JAMES FERGUSON,
Assistant Adjutant General.

These teamsters were leaving Fort Bridger and the service of the United States forever. They were permitted to escape by the humanity and integrity of the man to whom the order and escort referred to were committed, and from whom it was received by its present possessor. That man, however, was stripped of his property, driven from his home, and has ever since been persecuted for his disobedience. He worked for several years for the United States, under the guns of Camp Douglas, as a carpenter. During that time he was several times fired at, and once wounded in the outskirts of Salt Lake City. He was then in frequent receipt of anonymous letters warning him to leave the Territory, and threatening him with death if he remained. He is now in one of the new States of the West. It is thought best, however, for prudential reasons, to withhold both his name and his residence.

This order originally came through the hands of a Mormon bishop and an adopted son of Brigham Young. In January and February of 1867, the Mormon leaders supposed this order to be in the hands of General Conner, and their denial of its genuineness was only equalled by their abuse of the general. This induced its present custodian, then a United States officer in Great Salt Lake City, to inform them by a newspaper notice where the order was, to invite its examination by them, or anybody for them, at the same time offering every facility, legal or otherwise, to test its genuineness. Two persons, obviously the most likely to know the handwriting of Assistant Adjutant General James Ferguson, who seems to have signed the order, called and examined it. They were entirely silent on that occasion as to the handwriting. Not the slightest reference has since been made to it by the Mormons.

Of the many cases of murderous outrage referred to by the contestant's counsel in his printed argument, but one other can, with any detail, be noticed now, and that was the murder of Dr. J. K. Robinson, which took place in Salt Lake City, October 22, 1866, about eleven and a half o'clock, of a remarkably bright, clear, beautiful night, while the theater still retained its audience, and travel on the streets was in full activity. It is hard to conceive of a motive for the murder of such a man as Dr. Robinson. Thirty years or so of age at the time of his death, massive in his physical and mental organization, a physician as learned and skillful, in fact, as he was kind and liberal in his practice. He was as ready to succor the poor, without fee or reward, as the rich, with all the honors and emoluments of the profession. A devout Christian, without cant or affectation, Dr. Robinson entered heartily into the scheme of establishing a mission church in Salt Lake City, and at the time of his death was the superintendent of the Congregational Sunday school in that place. The motive to his death was probably revenge for an action of ejectment brought by him against the corporation of Salt Lake City for a tract of land containing a sulphur spring beyond its environs, of which he had been dispossessed, his fences and buildings torn down, and his workmen driven off by the police of the city. Seven men were engaged in his murder; and their detection and conviction imperatively demand the stern and immediate action of the Federal Government.

Dr. Robinson, like the Divine Founder of our religion, of whom it is believed he was a sincere and faithful follower, and like every man of sufficient consequence, since murdered, has been maligned by his murderers. This has been done from thirst of unsated revenge as well as to avert suspicion. The lie in this case was that Dr. Robinson had been gambling and was killed by one of his own kind. It is known to this contestant as well as to others, that Dr. Robinson was ignorant of all games of hazard, as well as of all their apparatus and devices. That calumny was put forth by the Mormon leaders and expositors in Salt Lake City. It shows the guilty authors of Dr. Robinson's murder as clearly as the slime of the serpent enables the wayfarer to trace him to his lair. It has been transferred to this Hall, and this House will be wanting in justice if it fail to visit its severest animadversion on the head of the traducer. All who knew Dr. Robinson without prejudice will join in the testimony that rarely, if ever, has there been a case which more strongly than his enjoins upon the living a tender regard for the memory of the dead.

This case, as well as many others, shows the existence of an organized band of murderers in Utah, as well as an authorized and established practice of murder inseparable from the Mormon system. It was so in Missouri, it was so in Nauvoo. It has been and will be so in Utah until the Federal Government shall stop it with a strong hand.

This contestant, therefore, above and beyond the immediate controversy in the present case, feels it to be his duty urgently but respectfully to recommend such changes in the laws of Utah and such action on the part of this House as shall result in bringing to condign punishment the actors in these and other outrages, as well as other violators of the law in that Territory. Sufficient evidence has been adduced in the present case, it is submitted, not only to call for the immediate investigation and action of this House, but to indicate very clearly the proper sources in inquiry. Some allegations of the sitting Delegate made on page 3 of his statement filed, demands the notice of this contestant even at the risk of prolixity. These allegations are as follows:

"The whole course of said people of Utah challenges history for a parallel in devotion to that Government of which they form a part. Persecuted and driven from their homes more than twenty years ago, while stripped of almost everything necessary to life, and houseless and homeless on the west bank of the Missouri, they promptly answered the call of the United States then engaged in a foreign war, furnished all the men asked for soldiers; penniless they took up their line of march, and westward moved with their families, their wives and their little ones; over barren plains, through hostile bands of savages; twelve hundred miles from civilization, after having endured untold hardships they came to a halt in what was then a desert. This desert, in this short space of time, they have filled with more than one hundred thousand people, and by their industry and frugality have made it a prosperous land, enabling them thus to add greatly to the rapid settlement and development of the country surrounding them. The very first step taken by the expelled exiles after once being settled in their new homes was to seek to connect themselves again to the Federal Union, and to ask a government guaranteed by its laws; and although they have been constantly abused, and almost continually denounced, even by many who have held high places, they have never ceased to seek and cultivate more intimate relations with the Government and people of the United States, and no people look forward with more eagerness and earnest delight to the completion of that great work which is soon to bring them and their once isolated country, in reality, almost to the very doors of the nation's capital."

The principal statement here made with so much apparent confidence, and that upon which the Mormons have always relied more than upon anything else for sympathy, is their persecution. That history, which the sitting Delegate "challenges" with such a clash of arms, very clearly shows that the Mormons never have been persecuted. Upon the death of Joseph and Hiram Smith the Mormons principally rest their claim of persecution; and upon the same fact they wholly rest the Divine indignation, communicated to them as they allege by revelation, which has doomed the Federal Government to sink beneath the Mormon power. The Mormons allege that both the Smiths fell by the Illinois gentiles, soldiers or citizens, or both. Now, Joseph and Hiram Smith were shot, but not by gentiles. They did not meet their deaths by the soldiers or citizens of Illinois. They were shot by a young Mormon, whose father had been plundered and his sister dishonored by Joseph Smith. For prudential reasons the name of the young man is withheld. It can be given, however, and the proofs produced.

The Mormon system is essentially and positively hostile to every other, and it places its own people in direct and inevitable conflict with every other. The Mormon alternative, Mormonism or the sword, is as clearly presented by that system as that of the Koran or the sword presented by Mohammed for more than twelve hundred years. In fact that very alternative and polygamy are borrowed from Mohammedanism. The Mormon system, by a most dangerous perversion of a few passages of Scripture, teaches that all true Mormons may kill and spoil all gentiles, as well as their own recreant brethren, whenever necessary to promote the interests of the Mormon system or that of its leaders. And in order to carry these murderous principles into practice the Mormons have organized a band of murderers, called the Danite band, which is coetaneous with the Mormon system. Abundant proofs have been presented by the Mormons themselves, that this murderous band was in full activity in Missouri as early as 1836 and 1837, and its bloody trail has followed them ever since. The Mountain Meadow massacre may be referred to as only one of the many instances of their sanguinary work.

The Mormon city of Nauvoo was a receptacle of murder and robbery. Many gentiles entered it and never came out or were heard of afterward. Nauvoo, while the Mormons were there, was one vast receptacle of stolen property from various parts of the State of Illinois, as the Mormon settlements in Missouri before. It was the habit of the Mormon, or saint, as he calls himself indifferently, to communicate to his gentile neighbor who chanced to be the owner of a fine farm and stock, for instance, that God had revealed to the saint that all the gentiles' property should belong to him, the saint. Such is now the promise of the system and its leaders.

The Nauvoo Legion, a formidable body of troops, was organized and carefully and ostentatiously drilled and disciplined by Joseph Smith, in Nauvoo, avowedly for purposes of aggression and conquest, just as the same thing is done in Utah at the present day. Now, in Utah this same Nauvoo Legion is plied with projects and promises of conquest over the gentiles as extravagant as those of Mohammed in the zenith of his power. The conclusion which this contestant therefore deduces from the nature, practice, and history of the Mormons is that they have not been persecuted. The force which the Gentiles employed upon them was no more than a natural reaction against the unprovoked aggressions of the Mormons themselves. It is in no just sense a persecution.

Equally erroneous is the statement of the sitting Delegate in reference to the employment of Mormon troops in our war with Mexico. History shows that General William Kearney and Colonels Doniphan, Frémont, and Mason, had swept every trace of Mexican power from every line of the Mormon exodus, and far beyond Utah, never to return, early in 1846, at least a year before the movement of the Mormons from the Missouri river. These officers had also suspended on the same lines the operations of the Indians, which were not resumed for several years.

It was supposed, however, that a movement of the United States troops from the Missouri river to and through California, by way of New Mexico, might secure the quiet of northern Texas, as well as the other Territories mentioned, and make an effective diversion in favor of General Taylor, and even of General Scott. A considerable number of Mormons were known to be preparing to migrate to San Bernardino, and other places in central California, and it was proposed to embody them in the forces above described. They were received accordingly, and these Mormon emigrants thus accomplished their intended journey in the pay and subsistence of the United States.

This project of accepting the Mormon troops originated with the Mormon leaders. It was one in which the Mormons were unquestionably party. The offer of the Mormon leaders to employ the Mormons for troops, if not prior to, was at least simultaneous with that of the United States Government. The few hundred Mormons thus employed as troops were subsisted and aided upon their own exact line of emigration. They experienced none of the casualties of war, for they never met an enemy or fired a shot.

There was one element of gross injustice in this transaction, not, however, on the part of the United States, but on that of the Mormon leaders. It was this: the large sum of money paid by the Federal Government on account of the Mormons thus employed as troops was received by Brigham Young avowedly for their families and relations. It was, however, appropriated by him to his own use, and little or none of it or of its value ever reached the rightful beneficiaries.

The Mormons reached Utah in July, 1847, when the possession of the United States was complete, permanent, and uncontested. On their march thither, as well as into California, they were but remote camp-followers of the Federal troops. The devotion to the United States claimed by the sitting Delegate for the Mormons has no real existence. During our late civil war not a man or a dollar was furnished or offered by them to the United States. Both Colorado and Nevada, with much smaller populations, furnished large numbers of troops. The hopes and prayers constantly expressed and repeated by the Mormon leaders and expositors were that both sections would be ruined. The hair-brained reverie of Jo. Smith, which the Mormon leaders and expositors proclaim to be an inspired prophecy, that the Mormons are to succeed to the Constitution and Government of the United States after both shall have failed in the hands of the gentiles, is well known to all conversant with Mormonism.

During our late war the predictions of the Mormon leaders were constant and emphatic that the Federal Government ought to and would fail. On one occasion Brigham Young declared in a tabernacle harangue:

"The North prays that every northern missile shall reach some southern heart, and so pray I. The South prays that every southern missile shall reach some northern heart, and so pray I. Let them kill each other, all, and the saints will save the women, the children, and the Constitution."

The response to this by the listeners seemed to be general.

The chagrin of the Mormon leaders, when the war terminated in favor of the North, was not at all concealed. The event was a falsification of all their predictions, and, therefore, a sore disappointment. When the news of our rejoicings for the return of peace reached Utah Brigham Young, in one of his harangues, proclaimed with a sane yell of disappointment, "Let them crow; it will not be long before that Great Babel, the United States Government, itself will fall."

The present and more recent accessions to Mormonism are nearly all European peasantry, from Sweden, Denmark, Wales, and England proper. On their arrival here they are hurried by Mormon agents from the Atlantic to Utah, and really know but little of the United States. Once in Utah, they are taught to distrust and hate our people and Government with all the intensity of fanaticism. Smith's diatribe, that the gentiles are to lose and the saints gain the power under the Constitution, is imposed upon them as divine revelation. All their teachings are subservient to this as a ruling idea.

The most horrid calumny and abuse are indulged by the Mormon leaders and expositors of the people and every branch of the Government of the United States. A late Mormon functionary of very high authority declared, some months before his death, in one of his Sunday harangues to the Mormon masses, that "among the gentile population of the United States more than half a million sons were living in incest with their own mothers." This was received by the Mormon audience as a report of the morals of our people not to be doubted.

The Federal Government, especially since the act of 1862, is made to share largely in this abuse.

This contestant avers, and wishes it to be distinctly understood by this House, that all statements of fact by him made, beyond the proofs in the case, are, as he is informed and believes, susceptible of irrefragable proof. Many of them can be proved by persons now in this city.

No doubt, as the sitting Delegate says, the Mormons are desirous of admission into the Union. They proclaimed that they would be admitted some years ago, and an unnaturalized Englishman, as the contestant is assured, came from London, and the sitting Delegate came from Utah to this Capitol as Senators of the State of Deseret. The Mormons avow their intention of perpetuating their polygamy, and placing their other crimes beyond the reach of judicial inquiry by admission into the Union as a State.

The population of Utah is grossly exaggerated by the statement of the sitting Delegate as one hundred thousand. It cannot be over forty-five or fifty thousand at the most. In 1860 the population of Utah, as shown by the census, was only a trifle over forty thousand. Since then portions of that population have been consigned to Nevada, Idaho, and Montana. Much of it also has emigrated to other States and Territories and to Europe. The natural increase of the population of Utah is not large.

This contestant, in conclusion, begs to refer briefly to himself. Two years of residence in Utah placed him in frequent and extensive contact with the Mormons as well as with the gentiles. His trade relations with all were mutually agreeable and profitable until disturbed by the interference of the Mormon leaders. A careful scrutiny of the condition of the Territory convinced this contestant that the Delegate instead of representing the true interests of the people of Utah was elected by the will of one man for the simple purpose of concealing or palliating existing evils and deceiving the Government of the United States. Thus impressed, and in the absence of any other candidate, he determined to seek election as the Delegate of Utah, and thus secure the Territory a representation in accord alike with the true interests of the people of that Territory and those of the United States. The experiment was obviously costly and perilous. It has annihilated the contestant's business in Utah, it has entailed upon him much expense and loss of valuable time. Whatever be the event of this controversy the contestant will, however, have the enduring satisfaction of having laid the wrongs and evils existing in Utah more fully before this House than any one had done before him.

Sincerely grateful for the kind indulgence of the House, the contestant submits his case to its judgment.

The first question was upon the following resolution:

Resolved, That William McGrorty is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

The question was taken upon the resolution; and it was agreed to.

The next question was upon the following resolution:

Resolved, That William H. Hooper is entitled to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of Utah.

Mr. DAWES. I move that that resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I move to reconsider the votes just taken; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that the House now take a recess.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the House now takes a recess it will be until ten o'clock a. m. to-morrow, at which time, by the unanimous order of the House, the session of to-day will be resumed, and the House will proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table. As that business will probably occupy the time up to twelve o'clock, or the commencement of the legislative day of to-morrow, members should be in attendance.

The question was taken upon the motion for a recess; and it was agreed to.

Accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House took a recess to ten a. m. to-morrow.

AFTER RECESS.

The House reassembled at ten o'clock a. m., [Friday, July 24.]

The SPEAKER announced as the regular order the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

TEMPORARY LOAN CERTIFICATES.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes.

The bill provides that for the sole purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the compound-interest notes outstanding, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to issue an additional amount of temporary loan certificates, not exceeding $25,000,000; said certificates to bear interest at the rate of three per cent. per annum, principal and interest payable in lawful money, on demand, and to be similar in all respects to the certificates authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the payment of compound-interest notes," approved March 2, 1867; and these certificates may constitute and be held by any national bank holding or owning the same, as a part of the reserve, in accordance with the provisions of the above-mentioned act of March 2, 1867.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE EXPENSES.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Appropriations for consideration at the present time, as in Committee of the Whole, a bill providing for the pay of temporary clerks in the State and Interior Departments, (this appropriation having been overlooked when the regular appropriation bill passed,) and also making a small appropriation for the surveyor general's office in Utah, that office not having been created when our regular appropriations were made.

There being no objection,

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, reported from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869; which was read a first and second time.

The bill makes the following appropriations: $20,200 for the employment of temporary clerks in the Indian Bureau, as follows: One clerk at $1,600 per annum; six clerks at $1,400 per annum; seven clerks at $1,200 per annum, and two female copyists at $900 per annum. Ten thousand dollars for the employment of temporary clerks in the State Department at a compensation of $1,200 each per annum; $9,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the salary, office expenses, and clerk hire of the surveyor general of Utah Territory, in accordance with the provisions of the act of July 16, 1868.

Mr. MULLINS. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not think I can yield for any amendment; but let the gentleman's proposition be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section the following:
Be it enacted, &c. That it shall be the duty of the commanding general of the fourth military district to ascertain the cost to the United States (for the year ending July 4, 1868) of maintaining law and order and civil government in Mississippi, and protecting loyal citizens in their rights; and it shall be his further duty to levy and collect a tax upon the property in the State sufficient to defray said expenses.

The SPEAKER. That amendment is not germane to this bill.

Mr. MULLINS. I thought it might be in order when we are acting as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order in Committee of the Whole, because the pertinency of amendments with reference to the scope of the bill is generally determined by the title; and this is entitled "A bill making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869."

Mr. KELSEY. Mr. Speaker, is this bill now being considered as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. KELSEY. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts why the sum of $10,000 is appropriated for temporary clerks in the State Department when several persons who are nominally clerks in that Department are absent and have been for one or two years, discharging no duty? They are regular clerks and excused from duty. Now, this appropriation is asked for temporary clerks to perform duties they ought to discharge here.

Mr. POMEROY. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KELSEY. My colleague can afford me the information I desire if the gentleman from Massachusetts cannot. I will ask him whether the clerk who has charge of preparing commercial statistics—I believe that is the designation—has not spent his entire time, with the exception of one or two weeks, in the city of Auburn, where my colleague resides?

Mr. POMEROY. That is the case to which I supposed he alluded. He has not been upon the pay-roll of the State Department for months and months.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And the office has been abolished.

Mr. KELSEY. How long has he been off the pay-roll of the State Department?

Mr. POMEROY. Since the commencement of the session. I inquired, and was told that he was not on the pay-roll.

Mr. KELSEY. That is different from the information I have on the subject.

Mr. POMEROY. I know it was months and months ago.

Mr. KELSEY. That is different from the information I have on the subject. I was informed that two months ago this person was on the pay-roll of the State Department, nominally in charge of this work of preparing commercial statistics, receiving $2,000 a year and performing no service whatever. If I am wrong I shall be happy to be corrected.

Mr. POMEROY. The gentleman he refers to was absent working, or pretending to work, on half pay. He is now not upon the pay-roll.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. However that may be we have abolished him and his office.

Mr. KELSEY. That is an answer to my question.

Mr. WELKER. What is the necessity for the employment of these extra clerks?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. In the State Department?

Mr. WELKER. In either Department.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. From the State Department the request comes to us in the most urgent form on account of the duties put upon that Department by Congress. They say they cannot get along with the present force of clerks. This is not for new clerks to be employed. Under the appropriation bills we cut off a portion of the present force, and they insist they cannot get along without these temporary clerks with the extra duty put upon them. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill from the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. BALDWIN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say this, and I wish the House would hear me. There is a Senate bill upon the Speaker's table which it is imperatively necessary should pass at once. It extends the revenue laws over the newly acquired Alaska purchase. The valuable portion of that purchase is St. Paul's Island, the only home of the fur-bearing seal in the world. The Russians have protected this island with a great deal of care in order not to have these seals cut off.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a point of order. I understand we came here at ten o'clock for the purpose of going to the Speaker's table.

Mr. BALDWIN. I have demanded the regular order of business.

Mr. MAYNARD. Until we have a quorum I hope it will not be insisted upon.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The only objection I have is to bills being taken up from the table out of their order.

Mr. BALDWIN. I insist upon the regular order.

FUNDING BILL.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the message of the Senate communicating their non concurrence in the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the House insist upon its amendments, and ask for a committee of conference.

The question being put, there were—ayes forty-six.

Mr. BECK. I insist upon a further division.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that the bill be passed over till the House is full.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. BECK. My only object in insisting upon a division is to have a quorum when action is taken. I will withdraw the objection as soon as there is a quorum.

The further consideration of the bill was accordingly reserved by unanimous consent till a quorum should be present.

CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I move that the House non-concur and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the House concur.

The SPEAKER. The latter motion has precedence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The Senate amendment strikes out an officer who is meritorious above all others to whom we have made any award. It strikes out General Wilson. The committee are opposed to that amendment, and therefore they ask a committee of conference.

Mr. PAINE. Allow me to inquire what is done with that portion of the reward which was given by the House to General Wilson?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. That is given to the three other officers, increasing their amount to $4,000, allowing General Wilson nothing.

Mr. PAINE. Which three officers? The commanders of the detachments?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I consider the striking out of the reward to General Wilson an outrage.

Mr. PAINE. I will ask the gentleman from Michigan, who must be familiar with the Senate amendment, as he moved to concur in it, whether the bill as it passed the Senate differs in any particular from that of the House than that it omits the name of General Wilson?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand that there is any other difference than that the $3,000 which the House bill gave to General Wilson is given to the three other principal officers named in the bill, namely: Colonel Pritchard, Colonel Harnden, and Captain Yeoman. That change was made upon the ground that in the offer made by the President of the United States there was no reason whatever for giving any portion of the reward to persons who had no share in the actual arrest. It is carrying out the principle which I have maintained and which I still insist is correct, that this offer having been made to those who were engaged in the capture, there was certainly no ground for giving any portion of the reward to persons who were one hundred miles or more distant. It was not a reward for meritorious service, as the gentleman from Massachusetts continues to insist. That is not the ground upon which the reward was offered. It was for those engaged in making the actual arrest. Now, I can see some reason—though I do confess I do not see much—for the distribution made by the committee to the several persons named in the bill who were not actually present.

They were most of them very near, were in the neighborhood, and therefore there is some ground for including them. But there is no pretense at all that General Wilson was in the neighborhood or participated in the capture himself. The committee propose to give him this sum simply for the reason, I believe, that he issued the orders; but he did not issue the immediate orders under which the capture was made. Those orders were issued by General Minty, commanding the division.

I am not here in this matter finding any fault with General Wilson, nor shall I detain the House with any extended remarks on this subject. I will simply say that I think the bill as amended by the Senate conforms more nearly to the offer of reward than did the bill as it went from the House. I have, therefore, moved to concur in the amendments of the Senate upon that ground. It will make an end of the question. I do not like the bill, and if I could vote it down I would. If I could keep every dollar of the money in the Treasury of the United States, instead of distributing it in this way, I would do it. But I know very well that the House intends to pass a bill of this sort, and inasmuch as I think the bill as amended by the Senate is quite as good as the bill as it passed the House, I hope the House will concur in the amendments of the Senate, and let us have an end of the matter.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I do not want to take up the time of the House, but simply to state the facts. The amount given to General Wilson by the bill as it originally passed is taken away from General Wilson by the amendments of the Senate and given to three other officers, neither of whom was engaged in the immediate capture. The capture was made by privates and non-commissioned officers. But General Wilson was the officer who sent out all the various regiments which assisted in the capture, and upon the principle which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLAIR] urges neither of these officers who are to receive the additional $3,000 would be entitled to a dollar. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was first upon agreeing to the amendments of the Senate; and being put, there were—ayes twenty-two, noes not counted.

So the amendments were disagreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, that a conference be asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and being put, the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. WASHBURN of Massachusetts, Mr. BLAIR, and Mr. ROSS, managers of the conference on the part of the House.

LINE OF OCEAN STEAMERS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports.

Mr. HILL. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and a conference asked upon the disagreeing votes thereon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to hear the amendments read.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line twelve, strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

Page 2, after line sixteen, insert: "And provided, That the average rate of speed of the steamships of said navigation company shall not be less than that of the steamships of other lines upon the same or similar routes, and if for the space of three months the trips successively of the steamships of said company shall be made in longer time than that employed by other steamships as aforesaid, then any contract made under the provisions of this act shall cease and determine at the pleasure of the Government of the United States."

Page 3, line six, after "postages," insert: "Provided, such postages shall not exceed $600,000 per annum, after the discontinuance of said inland postages."

Page 5, line twenty-six, strike out "twenty" and insert "ten."

Mr. WELKER. I have no opposition to make to the agreement to these amendments; but I desire to state that I see it noticed in a good many newspapers over the country that this bill gives a large subsidy, some three million dollars, to this company in addition to the contract to carry the mails. Now, I do not understand that there is any such provision in the bill. There is no subsidy at all provided for in the bill as it passed the House or as amended by the Senate.

Mr. HILL. There is none; none at all.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I understand from hearing the amendments read that the bill now provides that the company shall have the inland postages until the whole amount comes to $600,000.

Mr. HILL. Until all the postages amount to that.

Mr. SCOFIELD. As we passed the bill it was put very high, at $400,000.

Mr. DELANO. The gentleman will allow me to correct him. As the bill passed the House it allowed inland postages until the whole amount was $400,000. It then allows sea postages till the aggregate is $600,000 and limits the amount to $600,000; so that if the sea postages shall amount to over $600,000, the company can get no more than that.

Mr. ROSS. I would suggest that we had better postpone this bill until after the recess, when it will be cooler and pleasanter.

Mr. HILL. I hope the committee of conference will be granted. I think there will be no difficulty in coming to an agreement.

Mr. ROSS. I move that it be postponed until after the recess.

Mr. HILL. I do not yield for that motion. I call the previous question.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Is a motion to concur in the Senate amendments in order?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, even after the previous question has been ordered, because a motion to bring the two Houses to an agreement takes precedence of a motion to keep them divided in action.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not see why we should not concur in the amendments of the Senate. I make the motion to concur.

Mr. HILL. We only want to arrange one little matter.

Mr. SCOFIELD. That is just what I am afraid of.

The previous question was then seconded and the main question ordered.

The question was upon concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and being taken, there were upon a division—ayes 25, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Mr. ROSS. I would suggest that this bill should go over until after the recess.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HILL] state why he does not want these amendments concurred in?

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order, the previous question having been seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the House will not concur.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think we should understand this matter.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCOFIELD and Mr. HILL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 45, noes 53; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think we may as well have the yeas and nays, so as to give time for a quorum to come in.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HILL. All we desire is to have a committee of conference in order to have the time extended to fifteen years. The bill as passed by the House provided for a term of twenty years; the Senate by their amendment reduce the time to ten years. We think we can obtain an extension of the time to fifteen years.

Mr. MILLER. Is there any intention to obtain the insertion of a subsidy?

Mr. HILL. There is not.

Mr. ROSS. As there is no intention to obtain a subsidy, I will not further oppose the proposition for a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the yeas and nays, which have been ordered, can be dispensed with.

No objection was made.

The motion to concur was accordingly not agreed to.

The motion to non-concur and ask a committee of conference was then agreed to.

UNION CHAPEL, WASHINGTON.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 433, authorizing the trustees of the Union Chapel Methodist Episcopal church, in the city of Washington, to mortgage their property for church purposes; which was taken up, and read the first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the bill.

The bill, which was read, proposes to authorize George Reinhart, John Byram, John B. Hines, William Worth, and George T. McGlue, trustees of Union Chapel, of the Methodist Episcopal church, in the city of Washington, to execute and deliver a mortgage on lot No. 28 and lot No. 29, in square No. 101, belonging to that church in the city of Washington, in order thereby to enable these trustees to procure money for the purpose of erecting a parsonage on those lots and otherwise improving them, for the use and benefit of the church, in manner and form as the legally constituted authorities of the church shall prescribe and direct.

The bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORPS BADGES.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 93, granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the rebellion; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution, which was read, provides that all who served as officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, or other enlisted men in the regular Army, volunteer, or militia forces of the United States during the war of the rebellion, and have been honorably discharged from the service, or remain still in the same, shall be entitled to wear on occasions of ceremony the distinctive Army badge ordered for or adopted by the Army corps or division respectively in which they served.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCHANGE OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate joint resolution No. 121, to carry into effect the resolution approved March 2, 1867, providing for the exchange of certain public documents; which was taken up and read a first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the joint resolution.

The first section directs the Congressional Printer, whenever he shall be so directed by the joint Committee on the Library, to print fifty copies in addition to the regular number of all documents hereafter printed by order of either House of Congress or any Department or bureau of the Government, and whenever he shall be directed by the joint Committee on the Library one hundred copies additional of all documents ordered to be printed in excess of the usual number; the fifty or one hundred copies in each case to be delivered to the Librarian of Congress, to be exchanged under the direction of the joint Committee on the Library, as provided by the joint resolution approved March 2, 1867. The second section provides that fifty copies of each publication printed under direction of any Department or bureau of the Government, whether at the Congressional Printing Office or elsewhere, shall be placed at the disposal of the joint Committee on the Library, to carry out the provisions of the resolution of March 2, 1867.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to hear some explanation of this joint resolution.

Mr. BALDWIN. The object of this joint resolution is to enable us to carry into execution the joint resolution of March 2, 1867, providing for an exchange of public documents with foreign Governments. After the passage of that resolution there was correspondence with foreign Governments, and the proposition was generally and cordially responded to, and we have received from Russia, England, Spain, and some other countries, a large number of valuable documents; but as the Superintendent of Public Printing did not see that he was authorized to print the additional copies necessary for the exchange, we have been unable to send documents in return for those we have received. It is a point of honor with us that this resolution should be passed to carry into effect the joint resolution to which it refers.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I could not hear distinctly the explanation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BALDWIN.] The purpose of this resolution is perhaps a very good one; but it seems to me we propose to order a larger number of extra copies of documents than are necessary to effect the purpose which the gentleman from Massachusetts has in view. One of the great sources of expense, in reference to which so much complaint is made, is the enormous amount we are paying for the printing of documents. This resolution proposes the printing of a large additional number of every public document that may hereafter be published. The question is, are we not extending this matter further than is proper? Now, if the purpose is merely to make exchanges with foreign Governments, it seems to me we do not need so large an extra number as one hundred.

Mr. BALDWIN. The gentleman will observe that it is left to the Committee on the Library to decide whether so many as one hundred shall be devoted to this purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If this matter were always to be left to the discretion of my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. BALDWIN] I should be very well satisfied. But there may be a Committee on the Library that will avail itself, to the whole extent, of the provisions of this resolution, and I suggest to the gentleman—

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the gentleman allow me to finish my statement?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman is entitled to the floor, and can, of course, prevent me from making any statement that I want to make.

Mr. BALDWIN. There may occur cases in which we receive duplicates from other Governments and in which duplicates are required to be sent in return; and there may be other reasons for sending, in some cases, more than one copy of a document. It is a matter in which something must necessarily be left to the discretion of the committee, if we would avoid printing absolutely more than may generally be necessary.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will pass this resolution. I do not wish to increase the expense of our public printing. On the contrary, I am willing to act with anybody who desires to reduce that expense. But I submit that this proposition ought to be adopted. It will increase by only fifty or one hundred the usual number of copies of public documents; and the increased expense must be very slight. The object is to facilitate exchanges of documents with foreign Governments. By this means we shall receive documents which will be of great value. They will be placed in our libraries for the use of men interested in the affairs of the Government, and the benefit resulting will repay a thousand fold the extra expense. The objectionable matter in regard to our public printing is with regard to the extra copies that are ordered by the House for general distribution, and I am ready at any time to join with other members of the House in sweeping the whole of that away. But the adoption of the proposition now pending will be advantageous to the public interests, and will involve no considerable additional expense.

Mr. BALDWIN. I call for the previous question.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF ALASKA.

Mr. BANKS presented the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 1096), an act making appropriations of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its first amendment and agree to the preamble of the bill with amendments as follows: after the word "Russia," in the fourth line, insert the following words: "And the Senate thereafter gave its advice and consent to said treaty," and strike out all after the words "United States;" in the twelfth line, and insert instead thereof the following words: "And whereas said stipulations cannot be carried into full force and effect except by legislation to which the consent of both Houses of Congress is necessary;" and the House agree to the same as amended.

And they further recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

N. P. BANKS,
WILLIAM LOUGHRIDGE,
SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Managers on the part of the House.
CHARLES SUMNER,
O. P. MORTON,
J. R. DOOLITTLE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read as a part of my speech a copy of the bill as it will stand when the conference report is agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867.

Whereas the President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1867, entered into a treaty with the emperor of Russia, by the terms of which it was stipulated that, in consideration of the cession by the emperor of Russia to the United States of certain territory therein described, the United States should pay to the emperor of Russia the sum of $7,200,000, in coin; and whereas it was further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept of such cession, and that certain inhabitants of said territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and whereas said stipulations cannot be carried into full force and effect except by legislation to which the consent of both Houses of Congress is necessary: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated $7,200,000 in coin, to fulfill stipulations contained in the sixth article of the treaty with Russia, concluded at Washington on the 30th day of March, 1867.

Mr. BANKS. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. DELANO. I hope the House will vote down the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask my colleague to yield to me.

Mr. BANKS. For what purpose?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want to give my views.

Mr. BANKS. I do not want to yield the floor for debate. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I understand this is an entire surrender of all we have done.

Mr. BANKS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope it will be voted down.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 43.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the House to have the report again read. It is an entire surrender.

Mr. BANKS. It is no surrender at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is an entire surrender.

The question recurred on the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. DELANO demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that the motion be laid on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 43.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Will the chairman of the committee be entitled to an hour's debate after the main question is ordered?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman who has charge of the bill has the right to speak an hour.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MAYNARD. I withdraw the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. BANKS. I propose to yield to my colleague on the conference committee to state the reasons for his concurrence in the conference report.

Mr. PAINE. I renew the motion to lay upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider has been withdrawn; and there is nothing to which the gentleman's motion will apply.

Mr. PAINE. I move, then, that the conference report be laid upon the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 80, not voting 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Beatty, Benton, Boies, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cullom, Delano, Deweese, Farnsworth, Ferriss, Hamilton, Hawkins, Hill, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Logan, Miller, Moore, Nunn, Paine, Perham, Polsey, Seafeld, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, and Welker—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beck, Bingham, Blair, Boutwell, Boyden, Buckland, Buckley, Cary, Sidney Clarke, Dixon, Briggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Fields, French, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Goss, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenekes, Alexander H. Jones, Kerr, Koontz, Ladin, Lash, Loughridge, Mallory, Mann, Marshall, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Mercut, Mullins, Myers, Niblack, O'Neill, Orth, Pile, Poland, Pomeroy, Raun, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Shanks, Spalding, Starkweather, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Sypher, Taber, Taffe, John Trimble, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Whittemore, William Williams, Windom, and Wood—80.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Baker, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blackburn, Blaine, Bowen, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Broomall, Burr, Cake, Callis, Chanler, Churchill, Coburn, Cook, Cornell, Covode, Dawes, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Garfield, Gravelly, Griswold, Harding, Haughey, Heaton, Hinds, Hubbard, Hopkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Julian, Kellogg, Ketcham, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loan, Lynch, Marvin, McCarthy, McClurg, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Peters, Phelps, Pierce, Pike, Plants, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Roots, Schenck, Selye, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Smith, Aaron F. Stevens, Stone, Thomas, Upson, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Elihu B. Washburne, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—29.

So the House refused to lay the report on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on agreeing to the conference report unless the gentleman from Massachusetts claims the floor.

Mr. BANKS. I do not wish to speak. My colleague on the committee agrees to present his remarks at another time so that the time of the House shall not be taken up now.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to know whether we have not surrendered all that was put in the preamble.

Mr. BANKS. We have not surrendered anything. My colleague on the committee desires to say a word and I yield to him a moment.

Mr. PAINE. I would like to ask one question. What consideration has induced the gentleman who now has the floor to abandon the substance of his own amendment?

Mr. BANKS. I have yielded to my colleague to explain the matter.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do not desire to detain the House very long, as business on the Speaker's table is pressing. I am asked to explain my position in regard to the surrender of the substance of the preamble. I will state frankly that in my opinion the substance of the preamble is stricken out. I agreed to that as a friend of Alaska. I voted for the appropriation and I agreed to the report of the committee of conference simply because the majority of the committee were against me. I frankly say that I should myself have preferred to have had the entire preamble stricken off the bill.

Mr. PAINE. I would be glad to understand the gentleman. Do I understand him to admit that the substance of his preamble is stricken out?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I certainly do so consider it.

Mr. PAINE. I understand the chairman of the committee to deny that. I would be glad to hear the gentleman explain it.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I am not explaining the action of the chairman of the committee nor his denial. I am explaining my own position. I admit that the substance of the preamble is stricken out, and that I voted for the report simply because the majority of the committee were against me, and the report would have been the same whether I voted for it or not. I am satisfied further that the bill could not pass with the preamble as it passed the House, and for this reason: there is no doubt of the fact that there is between the Senate and House a vital difference of opinion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let the Senate give down.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I believe the Senate will not give down. I am satisfied it will not.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Why not?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hope gentlemen will not interrupt me. I say I am satisfied the Senate will not give down. I am equally satisfied that the House will not give down. The question then is simply this: Shall we compel the Senate to agree to our doctrine or shall we lose this bill?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the gentleman allow me a question? The Senate have undertaken to compel the House to yield and vote millions of dollars which we do not think ought to have been paid. Now, is it asking too much that the Senate shall at least yield to the acknowledgment which the House claims, that we shall have some protection in the future for the people of the country?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I claim that we yield nothing at all. All we do is to say we do not insist upon this declaration in connection with this bill. That is all. We can make the declaration elsewhere if we desire to do so.

Several members here asked the gentleman to yield.

Mr. BANKS. I object to any yielding by my colleague, to whom I yielded and to no one else.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I frankly admit that I agreed to the striking out of the preamble simply because I did not believe the bill could pass without so doing.

Several members here again asked the gentleman to yield.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a point of order. Who has the floor, the gentleman from Iowa or some other gentleman?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] having yielded to him with the limitation that he shall not yield to any one else. The Chair will therefore protect the gentleman from Iowa from interruptions. This is a uniform usage which all old members of the House are familiar with.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, I am not old enough to see that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has a right to tell the gentleman from Iowa what to say.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that when he has the floor he can yield upon any conditions he sees fit to impose, and resume the floor when he sees fit.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. My colleague imposed no conditions when he yielded.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to understand that the gentleman from Iowa knows what to say without being told by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not doubt that.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Upon my motion the House placed upon this bill a preamble setting forth fully and clearly the doctrines of this House. In the first place that no cession of territory can be made without the consent of the House; in the second place, that no money can be appropriated without the consent of the House; and in the third place, that no foreigners can be naturalized without the consent of the House. Now, to all of these propositions the Senate entirely disagree, and I am satisfied will never consent. The question, then, simply is, shall the Alaska bill be defeated or shall the House withdraw the demand that these principles shall be incorporated in this bill? As a friend of the Alaska bill, I have consented, so far as I am concerned, to withdraw our demand to have this placed in the bill. We have placed our vote on record in favor of these propositions. That vote stands there, and I have no doubt the House will adhere to it hereafter. And believing that the bill cannot pass without our withdrawal of this demand, I have consented to it. I do not ask the House to do it. I say frankly and freely I would rather the whole preamble was stricken out than to have it stand as it is now. I refused to sign the report of the committee of conference until the majority of the committee were against me and then I signed it.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BANKS. I object to his yielding,

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he will allow me to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will allow me to answer.

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; no.

Mr. MILLER. I rise to a question of order. I would ask whether, when the gentleman from Massachusetts has yielded to the gentleman from Iowa, he can dictate to the gentleman from Iowa whether he shall answer questions or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has answered that question on the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] A gentleman who has the floor can yield it unconditionally or conditionally and resume the floor whenever he sees fit. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has yielded the floor to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] on conditions, and as long as he maintains those conditions the Chair will protect him and his rights under the rules.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot answer any questions now. I will answer any question when I get possession of the floor, but I cannot now.

Mr. CULLOM. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he still persists in controlling the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BANKS. I do not control the gentleman from Iowa at all. I yield to my colleague on the conference committee, and to no other member of the House.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope he will allow the gentleman from Iowa to answer questions if he sees proper to do so.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order.

Mr. BENTON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to propound a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not answer parliamentary questions.

Mr. BENTON. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to say that he does not now object to the gentleman from Iowa answering questions.

Mr. BANKS. I have yielded to my colleague on the conference committee for the purpose of making a statement, and I yield to no one else.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. BENTON.]

Mr. LOGAN. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. LOGAN. I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] if he would allow the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] to answer me a question. The gentleman from Iowa insisted upon answering my question, and asked the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow him to answer it, and he would not do so. Now, my question of order is this: when a member is on the floor and desires to answer a question can another member stand behind him, as though he had a bayonet, and prevent his answering the question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide this point of order for the fourth time. Whenever the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] shall be entitled to the floor, and shall state that he will yield to another upon conditions, the Chair will protect him in the enforcement of those conditions, as he now protects the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] in enforcing the conditions upon which he has yielded the floor.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I hold the floor only by the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.] I would be glad to answer questions, but I have no right to do so without his consent.

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee of conference, I desire to say a few words in explanation of the report which I have signed.

The preamble as adopted originally by the House, stated fully and clearly that the three stipulations of the treaty mentioned therein:

1. The stipulation to pay the money.
2. The stipulation to accept of the cession of the Territory and its incorporation into this Government; and
3. The stipulation that the Russian inhabitants of said territory should be invested with the rights and privileges of American citizens, were all of them among the subjects which, by the Constitution were submitted to the power of Congress, and that Congress had jurisdiction over them, and that the same, nor any of them could have any force or effect until the assent of Congress is given thereto. This preamble was adopted by a vote of 98 yeas to 49 nays, and quite a number who voted against the preamble done so because the same concluded in favor of carrying the treaty into effect, while they were really in favor of the construction of the law as therein stated.

The declaration thus made by the House is clear, explicit, and unmistakable, and I have no doubt will be adhered to by the House in the future. To this declaration the Senate refused to agree, and hence the committee of conference.

The committee on the part of the Senate stated freely and frankly that they could, in no event, consent to the preamble, and that the Senate would not consent, and that they held that the House was bound to carry out the stipulations of all treaties, and that when a treaty provided for the payment of money for any purpose that such stipulation created a debt, and that the House had no discretion in relation to the payment of the same—doctrine, of course, utterly at variance with the law and with the principles asserted in the preamble as passed by the House—and it is manifestly impossible to reconcile opinions so utterly at variance upon so important a question. The majority of the committee on the part of the House could, in no event, consent to any such doctrine, so utterly subversive of the rights and constitutional prerogatives of the House. The only question, then, for the committee was whether the House should insist in incorporating the doctrine claimed by the House in the bill, and thus prevent the passage of the bill and the carrying out of the treaty, or whether, in view of this vital difference between the Senate and the House, it should not advise the waiver of the right to the declaration in the bill. The committee deemed the latter the better course. I am myself fully satisfied that the Senate will not consent to the original preamble, and that to insist upon it will simply defeat the bill, and this I, for one, should dislike to do.

It must be remembered that the committee in this course do not recommend the House to give up its claim or its position heretofore taken. But by the opposite course they would insist upon the Senate and the President solemnly consenting to the claim of the House.

If I were opposed to the passage of the bill I should oppose the course taken by the committee, but being in favor of it, and deeming this course necessary to the passage of the bill, I have agreed with the committee.

I think the Senate should have agreed to the preamble. In refusing to do so, they show an intention to continue the encroachment upon the rights of the House which has been going on on the part of the treaty-making power for years, and which this House owes it to itself and to the country to put a stop to. Had it not been for the peculiar circumstances of this case, not the least of which is the friendship shown us by Russia in the dark days of the rebellion, I should have felt like insisting upon the disagreement of the House and defeating the treaty, which would have been the result of that course.

The preamble agreed upon makes no statement upon the real question at issue between the House and Senate. It simply states that legislation is necessary to carry out the stipulations of the treaty which everybody admits and nobody denies. The real issue is waived. I understand this perfectly well, and I agreed to it with that understanding. The House gives up nothing, waives no jot or tittle of its claims of jurisdiction over the stipulations of treaties involving, as this does, matters which are submitted to Congress by the Constitution. It simply says it will not insist upon the Senate agreeing by this bill to the view of the Constitution as held by the House. But that each House shall retain and exercise the right to regulate its action in the future by its own judgment of the law.

The opinion of the House as to its power stands on record by the adoption of the original preamble, and the treaty-making power and the country and foreign nations can understand what the view of the House is and what their future course will be.

I would not consent to the passage of this bill if I thought it could be considered as a precedent and authority for like unauthorized acts by the treaty-making power in the future. But I think that the adoption of the preamble by the House in its original form by a large majority will be a sufficient answer to any such claim as against this House.

I hope this will be the last time we will be placed in such a position through the action of the treaty-making power; but that hereafter, before any steps are taken to purchase foreign territory, the President will obtain the consent of Congress; for in this case the President, in my opinion, has been guilty of a high-handed usurpation, and one for which he deserves the severest condemnation. And with the due notice which has been now given, I for one, as long as I have the honor of holding a seat upon this floor, shall never hereafter consider myself under any obligation to vote any appropriation to carry out a treaty, or to assent to the provisions of any treaty of purchase or acquisition of territory unless such treaty meets with the full assent of my judgment as to its expediency; and I understand this to be the settled determination of this House. The House knows its rights, and is aware of its constitutional prerogatives, and it will maintain them. I trust this bill will pass; that this treaty may be carried into effect.

Mr. BANKS. I owe an apology to members of the House for having introduced this report during the time when by an understanding the business on the Speaker's table was under consideration. Had I thought of that I should not have submitted the report at this time, and when the regular session of the next legislative day shall commence I will ask that so much additional time be given to the business on the Speaker's table as may be occupied by this report.

Now, in regard to the matter before the House, the two committees of conference have agreed unanimously to a report by which the preamble, in my judgment, is made identical in effect with the preamble as it passed the House of Representatives. The only question of difference between the two committees of conference was whether the preamble, as it passed the House, claimed for the House of Representatives a right to participate in the treaty-making power of the Government. My opinion was and is now that it does not claim any such power. The Senate conferees thought differently. My colleague on the committee, [Mr. LOGAN], who originally moved the preamble in the House, did not mean that it should claim on the part of the House a right to participate in the treaty-making power.

I will state, in substance, the report to which the committee of conference have agreed. It is that whenever a treaty is made, and it contains stipulations which require the action of the two Houses of Congress, the treaty cannot be carried into effect until that legislation shall be had. There are three stipulations in this treaty with Russia. One is that the cession of territory shall be accepted by the United States; another is that the sum of $7,200,000 in gold shall be appropriated for the purchase; and a third is that certain conditions in regard to citizenship shall be executed. The House has declared, and the committee of conference has consented to the declaration, that no one of the stipulations of the treaty with Russia can be carried into effect except by legislation to which the assent of both Houses is necessary. The report, therefore, in my judgment, perfectly sustains the claim of the House.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BANKS. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. The preamble, as agreed upon by the committee of conference, recites that the treaty with Russia stipulates for the payment of $7,200,000, &c., and then goes on to say that, "Whereas said stipulations"—referring to the stipulations in the treaty with Russia—"cannot be carried into full force and effect except by legislation to which the assent of both Houses is necessary," therefore $7,200,000 is appropriated. To what does the conference report refer, except the $7,200,000?

Mr. BANKS. Nothing but that, because the other conditions are to be carried into effect by legislation hereafter.

Mr. LOGAN. There is nothing in the report of the committee of conference in reference to legislation to be had hereafter. Yet the report refers to the stipulations in the treaty, and then refers to the appropriation of $7,200,000, and refers to nothing else.

Mr. BANKS. There is no stipulation in the treaty that can be carried into effect except by the consent of the two Houses of Congress. The stipulation that we carry into effect by this bill is the stipulation for the payment of money. The stipulation in regard to the government of that territory and the rights of citizens there is to be settled by legislation that is to come hereafter. We embody in this bill a provision for carrying out only one of the stipulations. The appropriate committees of the House will hereafter report other provisions.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask one question?

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The gentleman says that the treaty stipulations in reference to the rights of citizens depend upon acts of Congress hereafter to be passed.

Mr. BANKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The preamble contains this language:

And whereas it is further stipulated in said treaty that the United States shall accept such cession, and that certain inhabitants of that territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States.

You thus admit these people to all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States. I would like to know what future legislation is required on that point?

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman misunderstands entirely both the preamble and the resolution. The preamble refers to a contract. It is not executed. The declaration embodied by the conference committee in this report is that it cannot be executed except by consent of the two Houses of Congress. This House will decide whether that consent shall be given or withheld when the Committee on Territories shall have reported a bill on that question. A contract has been entered into by the treaty-making power; but it is unexecuted. The Government of the United States will not have assented to it until a bill to that effect shall have received the assent of the two Houses.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, rose.

Mr. BANKS. I yield one moment to my colleague for a question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not desire merely to ask a question. Will not my colleague, in a matter of this very great importance, allow a single word of debate on the side opposed to that which he occupies?

Mr. BANKS. The question has already been debated at length.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not this proposition. I want to explain how this differs from the proposition heretofore discussed. I would like to know whether this House will suffer its rights to be trampled on.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield the floor for debate. I say to my colleague that he has already debated this question at length.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Never this question.

Mr. BANKS. Yes, this question. He has occupied as much of the time of this House as I have. He has had a full opportunity to discuss this question, as the records will show. In the present condition of the public business I cannot consent that the time of the House shall be further occupied with this question. I regret that I introduced the report at this time. I would not have done so had I known that the House had set aside this morning for another purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he will not give me ten minutes of his hour? I have never taken up the time of the House in debating this matter.

Mr. BANKS. I cannot yield for any further debate.

Mr. LOGAN. Will not the gentleman give me five minutes?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put.

The motion was not agreed to, there being—ayes 37, noes 74.

The question recurred on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 48, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Archer, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Axtell, Bailey, Baldwin, Banks, Beck, Bingham, Blackburn, Blair, Boles, Bowen, Boyden, Buckley, Roderick R. Butler, Callis, Cary, Churchill, Reider W. Stevens, Thaddeus Stevens, Stewart, Stokes, Tabor, John Trimble, Twichell, Burt Van Horn, Vidal, Whittemore, William Williams, John T. Wilson, Windom, and Wood—91.

NAYS—Messrs. James M. Ashley, Baker, Beatty, Benton, Boutwell, Broomall, Buckland, Benjamin F. Butler, Cake, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Covode, Cullum, Delano, Deweese, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferris, Gravelly, Haughey, Hill, Judd, Kelley, Kelsey, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Miller, Moore, Mullins, Paine, Perham, Polsley, Schenck, Scofield, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, and Welker—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Adams, Allison, Anderson, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Boyer, Bromwell, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Cobb, Cook, Cornell, Dawes, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ela, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Harding, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hubbard, Humphrey, Juggs, Joll, Johnson, Julian, Kitchen, Knott, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Loughridge, Lynch, Mann, Marvin, McArthur, McClurg, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Mungen, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Peters, Pierce, Pike, Pile, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Robinson, Roots, Soyle, Shellabarger, Sigreaves, Stone, Thomas, Upson, Van Auker, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwallader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—77.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Cox.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 597) granting a pension to Rebecca C. Meeker;

A bill (S. No. 598) for the relief of Mary Scott;

A bill (S. No. 606) granting a pension to Robert Watson;

A bill (S. No. 630) granting increase of pension to Nancy A. Stocks;

A bill (S. No. 633) granting a pension to Nancy Smith;

A bill (S. No. 634) granting a pension to Violet Henry.

A bill (S. No. 637) to authorize the city of Washington to issue bonds for the purpose of paying the floating debt of the city;

A bill (S. No. 565) to authorize the Secretary of State to adjust the claim of Gustavus G. Cushman, for officer rent while commissioner under the reciprocity treaty;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 173) respecting the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 172) to construe an act entitled "An act to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Andrew S. Core.

It further requested the return of a bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief of Samuel Pierce, indefinitely postponed by the Senate.

It further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to a bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jeff. Davis, agreed to the conference asked for, and had appointed Mr. Howe, Mr. Howard, and Mr. Wilson managers of said conference on its part.

It further announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments to a bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports, agreed to the conference asked for, and had appointed Mr. RAMSEY, Mr. PATTERSON, and Mr. CATTELL as managers of said conference on its part.

SAMUEL PIERCE.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief of Samuel Pierce will be returned, as requested, to the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HOPKINS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates, for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes; when the Speaker signed the same.

BUSINESS UPON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. BANKS. In consideration of the time taken up by the House with the conference report on the Alaska purchase, I move that the time allowed for business upon the Speaker's table be extended for half an hour.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I object.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS AS TO CRIMES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 20, 1804, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,'" which was read a first and second time.

The bill provides that no person shall be prosecuted, tried, or punished for the capital offenses set forth in the act to which this act is an addition, unless the indictment for the same is found by a grand jury within five years after such capital offense is committed. Section two provides that this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and its provisions shall be applicable equally to offenses committed within three years before and offenses committed after its passage.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTORS FOR IRON-CLADS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WARD. I move to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Claims.

The question being put there were—ayes 56, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. PILE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Let the resolution be read.

The joint resolution was accordingly read at length. The preamble recites that Congress, by an act passed on the 2d of March, 1867, provided for the investigation by the Secretary of the Navy of the claims of all the contractors for building vessels of war and steam machinery, and that pursuant to that act the Secretary of the Navy appointed a naval board for the investigation of the claims in question, and that it appears that the provisions of said act have not been fully conformed to in the findings of the board; and Congress having neither the time nor means for the careful legal investigation which the importance of the subject demands, to relieve it from the further consideration of the subject, and as a final settlement of the claims of the contractors, the resolution provides the claims for building vessels of war and steam machinery, referred to in the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors," &c., approved March 2, 1867, be referred to the Court of Claims, which is hereby vested with jurisdiction under that act, whose duty it shall be to investigate and determine the claims of the several petitioners upon the principles of that act, and its finding is to have the same force and effect as any other judgment of the Court of Claims, provided that no claim shall be so referred under this act in favor of Secor & Co.; Perrine, Secor & Co.; Harrison Loring; the Atlantic Works, of Boston; Aquilla Adams; M. F. Merritt; Tomlinson, Hartup & Co.; or to Messrs. Poole & Hunt; or any or either of them, upon any vessel upon which an allowance was made by the board organized under the act of March 2, 1867.

At the conclusion of the reading of the joint resolution,

The SPEAKER said: The hour of twelve o'clock m. having arrived, the session of Thursday is closed, pursuant to the order of the House.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committee:

By Mr. BOYER, on behalf of Mr. PRUYN: The petition of Colonel J. G. Chandler and 10 others, officers of the Army, asking for an increase of the pay of the Army.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of Henry Fitzhugh, of Fredericksburg, Virginia, and claim for damage by Union Army to his property incurred during war.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: A letter of Isaac Carpenter, a lieutenant in the war of 1812, asking increase of pension, and indorsement of Governor Fenton, of New York, on the same, inviting attention to the case.

By Mr. WOODWARD: The petition of officers and soldiers of the Army, for increased pay.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 24, 1868.

Prayer by Rev. E. H. GRAY, D. D.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, recommending the removal of the Indians located on the Smith river farm, in California, to the Round Valley reservation in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating papers relating to the rights of freedmen under the third article of the treaty with the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations of Indians, concluded April 28, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITION.

Mr. McDONALD presented papers relative to the claim of Captain Samuel Houston, for compensation for a steamboat sunk and destroyed during the rebellion; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That Wilson D. Burlingame have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. ANTHONY. There has been an adverse report; but it is not proposed to refer the claim to the committee again, but the claimant wishes to withdraw his papers for the purpose of presenting them to the Department or the Court of Claims.

The order was adopted.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joel Hyatt, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 645) for the relief of Henry B. Ste. Marie; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 174) for the relief of Samuel Houston; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE SCRIP.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate take up House bill No. 23. It is a short bill of only five lines, and it will take but a moment to dispose of it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 23) to protect the rights of actual settlers on the public lands of the United States. It provides that in no case shall more than three sections of public lands of the United States be entered in any one township by means of scrip issued to any State under the act approved July 2, 1862, for the establishment of an agricultural college therein.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OFFICERS OF PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 173) respecting the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. If there be no objection, I should like to put the resolution on its passage. It is right, and it ought to be acted upon.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that persons now holding civil offices in the provisional governments of Virginia and Texas who cannot take and subscribe the oath prescribed by the act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes, approved July 2, 1862, shall be removed therefrom, and it shall be the duty of the district commander to fill the vacancies so created by the appointment of persons who can take the oath.

Mr. WILSON. I do not think anybody ought to oppose that resolution. That is the Constitution now.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORTS OF ENTRY.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1444) changing the ports of entry from Plymouth to Edenton, in North Carolina, and Port Royal to Beaufort, in South Carolina, have directed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to pass it now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the port of entry in the Albemarle collection district be removed from Plymouth to Edenton, North Carolina, and also that Beaufort, in South Carolina, be created a port of entry in lieu of Port Royal, which is abolished as a port of entry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETURN OF A BILL.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief of Samuel Pierce.

GUSTAVUS G. CUSHMAN.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senate to give me about ten or twelve minutes to pass three or four bills from the Committee on Commerce. I move to take up Senate bill No. 565.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a report. I want to pass a little bill that I wish to report.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let me take up my bill first. Give me ten minutes, and I shall be out of your way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When the ten minutes expire everybody will be here, and I cannot obtain the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 565) to authorize the Secretary of State to adjust the claim of Gustavus G. Cushman for office rent while commissioner under the reciprocity treaty. It authorizes the Secretary of State to reopen and adjust the accounts of Gustavus G. Cushman, late commissioner of fisheries under the late reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, so far as relates to a claim for office rent, upon the same basis as allowed to all his successors in office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SPECIFICATIONS OF PATENTS.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 345) relative to printing specifications of patents, have had it under consideration, and directed me to report it back without amendment, and I ask to have it put upon its passage. It is merely to save money to the Treasury. There will be no objection to it.

Mr. MORGAN. Will it lead to any debate?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs that no bills be paid by the Treasury for printing specifications of patents above the contract price, except that seventy cents may be added to each thousand words for the additional cost of composition occasioned by change made in the printing by order of the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have heard a great deal said about that subject.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will explain it in one minute. The Committee on Printing of the House had referred to them the subject of printing the specifications of patents. They have reported that a much larger sum has been paid than the contract price, owing to some alterations in the printing. This resolution is to prohibit the payment of anything more than the contract price, except a sum which the Committee on Printing estimate to be the fair value of the additional cost imposed by the Commissioner of Patents, which is much less than that which he has been paying. The resolution is entirely negative in its character, or intended to be.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS IN VESSELS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 162.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 162) to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels, was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there shall not be carried on any vessel on a voyage a greater number of passengers than in the following proportion: on the second deck, not being an orlop deck, one passenger for every one hundred and twenty cubic feet of clear space contained therein, and on the main deck and poop deck, one passenger for every one hundred cubic feet of clear space contained therein, the space in each case to be ascertained in the manner provided by law for the measurement of tonnage. If a greater number of "statute adults" than the number allowable by this proportion be carried during a voyage, or be brought within the United States by a voyage, or be taken on board a vessel within the United States for a voyage, the owner, agent, or master is to forfeit fifty dollars for each passenger so carried, brought, or taken on board in excess of the number allowable by the provisions of this section. And if the number of such statute adults in excess is more than twenty-five per cent. of such allowable number, the owner, agent, and master are to be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the owner or agent is to be fined not exceeding $2,000, and imprisoned not exceeding six months, or either, at the discretion of the court, and the master is to be imprisoned not less than six months and not more than one year. The second section provides that no passenger is to be carried on an orlop deck or temporary deck; nor on any deck where the height or distance between decks, or from the deck to the roof or covering of deck houses, measured on the inside, is less than six feet; nor upon any deck not having good and sufficient side lights and ventilation; nor on any sailing vessel except upon the main and poop decks and deck houses, subject to the limitation as to space and height between decks. The Committees on Commerce of the respective Houses are by the third section requested to prepare a bill for the better protection of emigrants on shipboard, and submit it on the opening of the session of Congress in December next.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to amend the resolution in section one, line five, by inserting after the word "deck" the words "or within a compartment on such deck."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. This is a pretty important measure. I have never seen it before.

Mr. CHANDLER. It has been on your desk for a considerable length of time.

Mr. CONNESS. I have not seen it, and I do not know what it contains. The people of my State are considerably interested in what it contemplates.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator will give way until we can act upon the amendments.

Mr. CONNESS. No; I cannot give way to a measure of this sort or permit it to pass until I know what it is.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator give way for an explanation?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. The House of Representatives passed the large bill which I hold in my hand, on this subject, containing a great many provisions, and establishing a bureau. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the Committee on Commerce referred it to me. I have had it examined very thoroughly, not only by persons interested in the importing of immigrants, but by all classes and every interest; and after a great deal of consideration the committee made a report in writing which has been upon the desks of Senators for some time.

Mr. CONNESS. I see the resolution was only reported July 16.

Mr. MORGAN. The committee accompanied their report with this joint resolution, which contains but a small part of the original House bill. It is simply to give immigrants more space and air. That is about all there is in it. By the third section of the joint resolution the Committees on Commerce of the respective Houses are requested to prepare a bill for the better protection of immigrants on shipboard, and to submit it on the opening of Congress in December next. This is a very important question, a very delicate question, to establish the exact medium between the immigrant and the ship-owner. This joint resolution is all that I thought we could get through at the present session. As I said before, it will make it a little more comfortable to the immigrant. I think it very important that it should pass. I have several amendments to offer to it.

Mr. CONNESS. The object undoubtedly is a worthy one, and one upon which I should like to see careful legislation; but it is too important a subject to legislate suddenly upon. The honorable Senator says that an elaborate bill came from the House. I think it came here a long time since. This resolution was only reported to the Senate on the 16th of July, eight days since. I did not know, for my part, of its being reported. I do not know how this meets the case, nor where it touches. The ships carrying passengers to California frequently take a very large number of passengers; but these ships are so constructed that they take them with great comfort and convenience; and I do not know but that this measure may break up that passenger business. I do not know to what extent it will affect it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will you give way to enable me to take up and pass a couple of other bills?

Mr. CONNESS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask that this resolution lie over informally while I have a couple of other bills passed.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope not. There is no bill more important than this. I feel it my duty, in justice to the immigrants, considering the number of deaths that have taken place, not to be interrupted by the Senator from California on this measure. This resolution ought to pass; at any rate it will not be put aside with my consent. It has been examined by the Committee on Commerce, and if the Senator from California has not seen it he ought to be willing to admit that somebody else has some knowledge of these matters as well as himself. I am not willing to have this resolution put aside.

Mr. CONNESS. This is extraordinary language that the Senator from New York uses. His threatening that this resolution shall not be put aside by the Senator from California is rather queer language. I suppose the Senator will concede my right to inquire into the terms of a measure which he proposes. I suppose that inquiry will hardly be construed by others as an interruption. If it is, it must be taken as an interruption.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know how much the honorable Senator is interested in the object for which this resolution is introduced. I am very deeply interested. I do not know to what extent this resolution meets the difficulties of the case.

The honorable Senator says that I need not suppose that no other person is competent or able or disposed to understand this question but myself. I have said that is a queer answer to what I had said. I had said I did not understand it. I did not protest that I did, but that I did not. The Senator from Michigan asked that it be laid over for a few minutes that the other bills that the committee have in charge might be passed. The Senator from New York is not willing that those few minutes shall be given to consider this measure. Well, sir, then we must discuss it, that is all. I suppose the Senator cannot prohibit that. I did not attribute anything but the highest motives and highest degree of ability to the Senator; but I do not know what could authorize him to discuss this question as he has done.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is all right; let it pass.

Mr. CONNESS. I very much prefer that it should lie over until the other bills are acted upon. I may at that time be willing that it should go through; but I am disposed to understand it if I can. I should like to have the aid of the honorable Senator to enable me to understand it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Without displacing this matter, I will move that we take up House bill No. 633, while the Senator is examining this resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I have been waited upon by a great many persons for the purpose of having this measure passed. I made a report upon it, and I now send the report to the Chair, and ask that it be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to hear it.

Mr. MORGAN. It will contain the information that the Senator from California wants. I have no interest in this resolution beyond having a proper measure for the protection of immigrants and to do justice to the owners of ships.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire simply to say that the honorable Senator from California, as soon as he hears that report, will be willing to allow this resolution to pass.

Mr. CONNESS. All I asked for was information. I am very glad to have the report presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MORGAN from the Committee on Commerce on the 16th instant:

The following papers have been referred to the Committee on Commerce:

1. Resolutions adopted by a meeting of citizens of Cincinnati, in relation to treatment of emigrant passengers in sailing vessels of the Hamburg line.

2. Senate bill No. 247.

3. H. R. bill No. 995.

4. H. R. bill No. 1100.

5. H. R. bill No. 1100, amended.

6. H. R. bill No. 1372.

The number of bills of this nature submitted at the present session, and the variety of their provisions, indicate how general is the interest in the subject, and that our previous legislation thereon is fundamentally defective.

The proper care of the emigrant while on shipboard has engaged more or less attention from Congress and the public for fifty years past, but an examination of our passenger laws will show them generally to be in the nature of expedients, and partial in their provisions, rather than well-digested and comprehensive enactments.

Inquiry will show that emigration to the United States has been of so rapid, and often of so irregular a growth, as to keep in advance of adequate facilities. Hence, while too many of the evils complained of are abuses resulting from indifference or inhumanity, there have been certain others quite unavoidable in their nature. A close scrutiny has become necessary, and it is time that the whole subject was considered with a view to early and suitable action.

For existing evils two cases, two classes of remedies will be found requisite: legislation and a well directed public sentiment. And in legislating, two incidental objects ought steadily to be kept in view: first, that of favoring the industrious, intelligent, and moral over the opposite classes of emigrants, so far as it is the law's province to discriminate; and, second, such statutory recognition as shall, while making all needful provision for the passenger's comfort, tend to foster rather than to embarrass American shipping interests.

It is to the principal question appears to have been complicated by an assumed antagonism between the emigrant and the ship-owner; but wherefore, it would be quite difficult to say; for, in the nature of things, there is one of reciprocal advantages, essentially the same as that between carrier and patron on the great steamship lines. Laws thus originating in error must inevitably tend to drive out wholesome competition in the carrying trade, and thereby deprive commerce of a most efficient corrective of abuses.

The portions of Europe whence comes the larger share of emigration are over-peopled, and labor there is ill-compensated. Of this excess the provident and enterprising portions would naturally be first to seek this country. Shall they be encouraged, or shall we by ill-founded laws draw hitherward the thrifless instead? Staunch and well-appointed vessels will secure the former, while shipping scarcely better in accommodations than floating prisons would assure a large proportion of the latter. Honorable American ship-owners, having every inducement to encourage the incoming of the better classes, will, doubtless, compete with foreign ship merchants for the passenger trade, unless restrained by laws that bear with special severity upon American vessels. Healthy rivalry would soon afford ample facilities, and thus by offering the passenger a choice of vessels place the question of comfort largely in his own hands.

A simple code of regulations, recognizing the rights of adult and infant alike, and especially designed for protecting the female, should be placed in every passenger vessel. Penalties should be proportioned to offenses, and remedies should, so far as practicable, be in the nature of private suits, enforceable by the party wronged. Justice may thus be made prompt, certain, and inexpensive. The intervention of Government bureaus, or other cumbersome and dilatory agencies, should be avoided. To insure speedy adjustment of well-founded claims, the propriety of requiring a moderate guarantee fund from ship-owners, to be lodged in suitable hands, attachable by order of court, the amount to be graduated according to the vessels' capacity, might be considered. Local boards, composed of citizens of standing, familiar with the laws and zealous to protect the emigrant, like the commissioners of emigration in New York, already exist by virtue of State authority at the principal ports, and would be found ready to second any enlightened plan of Congress.

A brief reference to facts will show how rapid has been the growth of emigration. President Monroe, referring in his annual message of 1823 to the increase of population in the United States, says: "What is more extraordinary, it is almost altogether native, for immigration from other countries has been inconsiderable."

The arrivals from 1819 to 1829 averaged but 12,000 annually; for the next ten years the annual average was 53,800; for the succeeding decade it was 143,000 per year; and for the five years next following, that is from 1850 to 1855, it was 333,000 annually. Official statistics for subsequent years are not at hand.

Emigration, as now known, is of comparatively recent origin. True, mankind have roamed a good deal in every age, and history, sacred and profane, is crowded with records of migrations of nomadic tribes, the inroads of adventurous men, and the forcible colonization of particular regions. After the discovery of America, emigration assumed a peaceful and somewhat systematic character, though the earlier colonies in the New World were often established by fortune-hunters whose objects were not to found permanent settlements. America, however, became, and still continues to be the principal field of emigration, and we shall derive little aid from foreign precedents in framing passenger laws. The protection of the passenger in his person and morals, recognition of the ship-owner's rights, the security to the public health, and the non-deportation hitherto of foreign criminals are the essential points to be observed. Our countrymen cordially welcome the intelligent farmer, laborer, and skilled mechanic of Europe. Our public works, the situation of the national domain, the underpeopled Territories, and the demands of our rising manufactures will, for some time to come, encourage accessions to the industrial classes here. And the spirit of the period paves the way for the incoming of a larger proportion of men in early prime of life than hitherto. The dogma, long tenaciously adhered to in Europe, that "once a citizen always a citizen," is yielding to the broader American doctrine of the inherent right to change home and allegiance.

Full one third of emigration to the United States comes from Germany. That country is just now engaged in preparing a passenger bill. From Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and England, come three fifths of all who reach our shores, and it is believed that Great Britain would be disposed to consider the question of assimilating passenger laws. France would also, it is thought, unite in an examination of the subject with a view to the prevention of future abuses to emigrants on shipboard; and to international regulation, enforced by laws of the respective countries, must we look for a full solution of present difficulties, for they would reach the greater evils than these. Acts of Congress, it must be borne in mind, have but limited application beyond American vessels. Hence excessive penalties and other injudicious provisions not only fail of their object, but paralyze American enterprise.

The spirit of the Federal and State constitutions toward the foreign-born citizen is most liberal; hence we have no occasion to oppress the ship merchant, or to wrong any interest for the sake of assuring him of the friendly disposition of our people.

The season is already so far advanced that legislation could not be availed of to any great extent this year. A brief enactment or joint resolution defining the amount of space to which each passenger is entitled, and fixing a penalty for the use of orlop decks for passengers, might, however, be passed. The committees of the two Houses should, at the same time, be authorized to prepare a bill, after correspondence with the three foreign Governments named above, and consultation with those persons who have enjoyed opportunities, official and other, for observation, for submission at the meeting of Congress in December. The importance of the subject and the variety of provisions necessary to be embraced, coupled with the unsatisfactory nature of previous legislation, would appear to render this course necessary. It is proper to add that no expense would be thereby involved.

Mature deliberation is essential in another respect. It is desirable to have as little machinery as possible. Congress does not want to raise up a swarm of port functionaries and informers by the offer of a share of penalties, nor to confer unnecessary powers upon bureau officers, nor yet to refer to heads of Departments at Washington, questions that are susceptible of more speedy and satisfactory adjustment at the respective ports.

The committee submit the accompanying draught of a joint resolution which conforms in terms to the recommendations made above:

Joint resolution to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall not be carried on any vessel on a voyage a greater number of passengers than in the following proportion, to wit: on the second deck, or within a compartment on such deck, not being an orlop deck, one passenger for every one hundred and twenty cubic feet of clear space contained therein, and on the main deck or within a compartment on such deck or spar deck, one passenger for every one hundred cubic feet of clear space contained therein, the space in each case to be ascertained in the manner provided by law for the measurement of tonnage. If a greater number of "statute adults" than the number allowable by the proportion aforesaid be carried during a voyage, or be brought within the United States by a voyage, or be taken on board a vessel within the United States for a voyage, the owner, agent, or master shall forfeit fifty dollars for each passenger so carried, brought or taken on board in excess of the number allowable by the provisions of this section. And if the number of such statute adults in excess is more than twenty-five per cent. of such allowable number, the owner, agent, and master shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof the owner or agent shall be fined not exceeding $2,000, and imprisoned not exceeding six months, or either, at the discretion of the court; and the master shall be imprisoned not less than six months, and not more than one year.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That no passenger shall be carried on an orlop deck or temporary deck; nor on any deck where the height or distance between decks, or from the deck to the roof or covering of deck houses, measured on the inside, is less than six feet; nor upon any deck not having good and sufficient ventilation; nor on any sailing vessel except upon the main and poop decks and deck houses, subject to the aforesaid provisions as to space, height between decks, and ventilation; and for every violation of the provisions of this section the owner, agent, or master shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $2,000, and not less than $500.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That the Committee on Commerce of the respective Houses be, and they are hereby, requested to prepare a bill for the better protection of emigrants on shipboard, and embracing such other provisions as may to them seem proper, and submit the same on the opening of the session of Congress in December next.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to inquire now of one of the members of the Committee on Commerce what number of passengers, according to this arrangement, may be carried by a ship of given tonnage? I know that there is a necessity for regulating the passenger traffic, particularly the immigrant traffic; and to regulate that as well as to regulate the other passenger traffic I am always ready, and have been.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is already regulated by law, the number of passengers.

Mr. CONNESS. Yes; but this is a new regulation; and I do not understand it as applied to the tonnage of a vessel, say of two or three thousand tons. Can the chairman of the committee answer me, under this division of space that is provided here, how many passengers can be carried in a ship of two thousand tons?

Mr. MORGAN. I stated to the Senate that this does not affect the general law. It only gives so much space to each passenger. The House bill was so large, and contained so many provisions that it was not deemed advisable to attempt to carry out more than the first two sections. They were drawn at the Treasury Department, and submitted to the ship-owners of New York and the commissioners of immigration in New York, and the commissioners of immigration in Baltimore, and to various other parties, and these two sections as they stand were the result of their examination. They all deem it important that those two sections should be passed at this time.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I will ask the Senator, if he will answer it, whether he has any objection to confining the application of the resolution to the carrying of immigrants across the Atlantic ocean?

Mr. MORGAN. That is the main thing the resolution is to provide for.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator accept an amendment giving it that application?

Mr. MORGAN. If there is any reason why any part of the country should be excepted from its operation, and that can be shown, I shall not object to it. I do not know any reason for making any exception myself; but if there are any good reasons for doing so of course I have no objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I am not prepared now to give the reasons, because the Senator will see that neither he nor I understand, according to this arrangement, how many passengers a ship of a given size is allowed to carry. My desire to protect the immigrants is as strong as the Senator's can possibly be. But as to our passenger ships going from New York to California, the Senator understands that there is at the present time a great competition in the carriage, and that they are doing very well in this regard. I do not know to what extent, or whether this resolution would interfere with them at all. The Senator is not able to answer my inquiry as to the number of passengers this arrangement would give to a ship of a given tonnage. If it has been ascertained that this is a necessary regulation for emigrant ships, and the committee will agree to confine it to emigrant ships, of course I can have no objection, and I am glad that the committee has undertaken to regulate that business, because I think it one of the most inhuman traffics as now carried on known to the world. I would thank the committee for their efforts in that behalf; but I do not understand the degree to which this measure may interfere with the passenger traffic where emigrants are not carried. I desired that information at which the Senator got angry.

Mr. MORGAN. I should be very glad to go on and make some amendments to this resolution, and when we have it perfected the Senator from California can understand better what it is.

Mr. CONNESS. I will give way until the Senator gets through with his amendments.

Mr. MORGAN. In section one, line eight, after the words "main deck," I move to insert "or within a compartment on said deck;" and in the same line to strike out the word "poop" and insert the word "spar;" so that it will read:

And on the main deck or within a compartment on said deck and spar deck one passenger for every one hundred cubic feet of clear space contained therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. The next amendment is in section two, line seven, to strike out the words "side lights and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. The next amendment is in section two, line nine, to strike out the word "limitation" and insert "provision."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In the same line, after the word "space," I move to strike out the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to add to the end of that section the following:

And for ventilation; and for every violation of the provisions of this act the owner, agent, or master shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $2,000 and not less than $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. The next amendment is in section three, line four, after the word "ship-board," to insert:

And embracing such other provisions as may to them seem proper.

That is in relation to the report of the committee at the next session.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In section two, lines seven and eight, I move to strike out the words "main and poop decks and," and to insert "one deck situated immediately below the upper or main deck and in;" so that the clause will read:

Nor upon any deck not having good and sufficient ventilation; nor on any sailing vessel except upon one deck situated immediately below the upper or main deck and in deck houses subject to the aforesaid provision, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I offer the following, to come in as a proviso at the end of the second section:

Provided, That the provisions of this resolution shall only apply to ships engaged in carrying emigrants from ports in the United States and Europe.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall not object to the amendment that is proposed by the Senator from California. There has been such a general demand from all sections of the country, as has been shown by the report and by the various bills that have been introduced, and the numerous petitions presented from Cincinnati and Cleveland, for the passage of these two sections, and I regard them as so important, that if the Senator wishes to make an exception in relation to passengers to California I shall not object. It is very important that the joint resolution should pass.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say one word in explanation. We have for the first time in a long period an active competition between two lines in carrying passengers to California. It is regarded by our whole people as a fortuitous circumstance. It is giving us that increase of population which we so much require. There is already a labor exchange established at San Francisco to provide for the employment of immigrants, and it is carried on very vigorously. I do not know to what extent this joint resolution might interfere with that traffic. It is now going on in the most acceptable manner. Nobody objects to it. The whole community in California hail it as something not to be disturbed, but to be encouraged; and as the joint resolution, to which I have no objection, proposes to protect immigrants crossing the Atlantic, I hope this amendment will be adopted, which will leave us as we are, at least until the committee shall have time to examine the subject next December.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

Subsequently,

Mr. CONNESS said: I should like to modify the amendment that I offered to Senate joint resolution No. 162, to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels, which passed a few minutes since, so that it may be engrossed. It will take but a moment. I move to reconsider the vote on the passage of the joint resolution for the purpose of modifying the amendment that was adopted on my motion.

Mr. MORGAN. I should prefer to have the Senator from California state what his amendment is. Perhaps the Senate will not object to it.

Mr. CONNESS. I submitted it to the Senator, and understood he approved it.

Mr. MORGAN. State it to the Senate, and it may be adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to substitute in lieu of the provision that I offered the following:

Provided, That the provisions of this resolution shall not apply to ships engaged in carrying passengers from the port of New York to California.

I do not wish the regulations applied to emigrant ships to be applied to these vessels, because they are differently constructed; and the amendment heretofore adopted does not secure that end.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment now proposed by the Senator from California will be substituted for the amendment heretofore adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator from California desires the amendment in that form I shall not object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, it will be substituted for the other amendment.

SURVEYS OF RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 823.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 823) in relation to surveys and examinations of rivers and harbors. It directs the Secretary of War to cause to be prepared and submitted to Congress in connection with the reports of examinations and surveys of rivers and harbors hereafter made by order of Congress, full statements of all existing facts tending to show to what extent the general commerce of the country will be promoted by the several works of improvements contemplated by such examinations and surveys, to the end that public moneys shall not be applied excepting where such improvements shall tend to subserve the general commercial and navigation interests of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF SHIPS TO FRIENDLY BELLIGERENTS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 94.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 94) declaratory of the law in regard to the sale of ships to friendly belligerents.

Mr. CHANDLER. That bill was once passed and then reconsidered on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. PATTERSON,] who has withdrawn his opposition to it.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Not exactly that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I so understood.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I will say a word in relation to this bill. This bill passed the Senate the other day and I moved a reconsideration, and I wish to give my reasons for having done so.

It is known that the Committee on Retrenchment have had under consideration for a long time the matter of the sale of one of our ironclads to the Peruvian Government. It was thought by some members of the committee that this bill trenching upon the course of the Government on that subject. I will read the section of the neutrality laws which members of the committee thought this bill interfered with:

"If any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or State, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace; or shall issue or deliver a commission, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than $10,000, and imprisoned not more than two years. And every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores which may have been procured for the building and equipment thereof, shall be forfeited: one half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the United States."

Now, this bill provides:

That, in order to remove all doubt with regard to the existing law, it is hereby declared that nothing contained therein shall be construed to render it illegal to sell or charter a vessel or steamer built within the United States, or purchased from the United States, to any foreign Government at peace with the United States, or to any subject of such Government, although the vessel or steamer be wholly or in part prepared for war: Provided, That the transaction is simply commercial, with no intent on the part of the seller or charterer to participate in any belligerent act, and that the vessel or steamer, while in transitu, is in no respect exempted from the law of contraband.

In the case of the Meteor, Judge Nelson decided that it was lawful to sell a vessel of war to a foreign Power as a mere commercial transaction, provided there was no evidence of an intent on the part of the person making the sale to engage in war with a Power with which we were at peace; but it seemed to the committee that this bill covered a little larger ground than that; that it came in conflict with the law. However, I do not wish personally to take the responsibility of preventing the passage of this bill. I do not withdraw my objection to it; but I wish to throw upon the Senate the responsibility of passing the bill or refusing to pass it; because Mr. Forbes, who owned the Meteor, has written me in relation to it, and says that he was put to an expense of over $200,000 in the case of the Meteor, and it was decided by Judge Nelson that his case was a good one; that there was no reason for arresting his vessel.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I submit to the honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whether he had not better allow this bill to go over in order that we may proceed with some others?

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire. I have nothing more to say further than that I wish the responsibility of this matter to be thrown upon the Senate and not to take it myself. I call the attention of the lawyers of the Senate, who have considered this matter, of course, more fully than I have, and are better capable of judging of the import and force of the bill, to consider it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let it go over. Mr. CHANDLER. If there is nothing more to be said, I ask that it be put on its passage. It has been drawn by the Committee on Commerce, and has been carefully prepared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President—
Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope it will be allowed to go over.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it leads to any discussion I am willing that it shall be laid aside.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is an expression in this bill which I am satisfied may get the United States into difficulty, and with a slight amendment I do not know that I should press any objection to it. I knew nothing of it until it was called up on this occasion; but I cannot sit still without entering my protest against its passage. I would rather it should go over. I should like to look into it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 433) authorizing the trustees of Union Chapel of the Methodist-Episcopal church in the city of Washington to mortgage their church property for church purposes;

A bill (S. No. 543) to provide for a further issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes;

A bill (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 26, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States';"

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the rebellion; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to carry into effect the resolution approved March 2, 1867, providing for the exchange of certain public documents.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1447) granting the right of way to certain railway companies over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said bill, and had appointed Mr. W. B. WASHBURN of Massachusetts, Mr. A. BLAIR of Michigan, and Mr. L. W. ROSS of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1096) making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867.

REWARD FOR JEFFERSON DAVIS'S CAPTURE.

On motion by Mr. HOWE, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 1277) to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President of the United States for the capture of Jefferson Davis, disagreed to by the House; and
On motion by Mr. HOWE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HOWE, Mr. HOWARD, and Mr. WILSON.

AMERICAN STEAM LINE TO EUROPE.

On motion by Mr. POMEROY, the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports, disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and

On motion by Mr. POMEROY, it was
Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. RAMSEY, Mr. PATTERSON of New Hampshire, and Mr. CATTELL.

ALEXANDRIA CANAL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1275.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1275) relating to the Alexandria canal.

The Committee on Commerce reported the bill with amendments. The first amendment was in section one, line three, after the word "that," to strike out the following words:

The said grant, lease, and conveyance be, and the same is hereby, sanctioned, ratified, and confirmed; and the said president and directors of the said canal company are hereby authorized and empowered to execute any and all other leases, agreements, and conveyances that may be necessary to render the said lease valid and effectual.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether the right of the lessees to that canal is not now a matter of litigation before the courts?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will allow the amendments of the committee to be made, I will then explain the precise nature of the bill.

Mr. CORBETT. I ask that the bill be read as amended. That will show how it stands.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We have not got it amended yet.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first section, as amended, reads as follows:

That the said aqueduct across the Potomac river from Georgetown to the Virginia shore, and so connecting the said canals, is hereby declared to be a lawful structure in its present position and elevation, anything in any law or laws of the United States, or of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

The next amendment was in section three, line four, after the words "to the," to strike out the following words:

City of Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, and to connect with the Orange and Alexandria railroad, and Alexandria, Loudoun, and Hampshire railroad, at Alexandria; and it shall be lawful for the said lessees, their associates, their successors, to lay out, build, operate, and maintain the said railroad upon the berme bank of said canal, in whole or in part, with power and authority to diverge therefrom when and as often as may be necessary, in order to obtain the best and most direct route between said aqueduct and the city of Alexandria: Provided, however, That said railroad shall not be laid out, constructed, or operated, as to impede or interfere with the convenient and legitimate use of the said canal or aqueduct as a canal, and for the transportation of persons and property by water.

And to insert the words "Virginia shore and there to connect with said railroad;" so that the section will read:

That it shall be lawful for the said lessees, their associates and successors, to lay out, construct, maintain, and operate a railroad across said bridge from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to the Virginia shore, and there to connect with said railroad.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said lessees, their associates and successors, to transport passengers, freight, and baggage over said railroad, and to collect fare or tolls for the same: And it is further provided, That in case the Alexandria Canal Company shall elect, as by the terms of said lease they have the right to, to reënter and repossess the said canal, said company shall also have the right at the same time to take possession of the said railroad and bridge, by first paying the lessees and their successors the actual value of the superadded and superimposed works, to be ascertained by referees to be equally chosen by the president and directors of the Alexandria Canal Company and the lessees and their successors; said referees to choose an umpire, if one should become necessary, in order to agree upon such value; but if the said canal company shall not so elect to reënter and possess said canal and acquire said railroad and bridge, then said bridge and railroad, with all its property, rights, and effects shall be and remain the property of the lessees and their associates, with full power to maintain and use the same, but they shall repair and be liable for all damages which may at any time be done to the said canal by said railroad, or which may be caused by the use of any of the canal property for the purposes of the railroad. Said railroad to be kept on the same footing as postal roads are required to be kept.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to state in a word what this bill is. As it came to the Senate, it provided for the construction of a railroad from Georgetown across the river, and thence by the line of the canal to Alexandria. As it now stands, it authorizes simply the construction of a railroad across the aqueduct bridge, which is declared by this bill to be a legal structure.

In regard to that part of the bill to which the Senator from West Virginia refers, which was to make valid a certain lease heretofore existing between the canal company and the railroad company chartered by Virginia, that has all been stricken out. The committee of the Senate did not think it worth while for the Congress of the United States to say anything at all about contracts or leases or anything else between other parties; but preferred to leave it to law.

The next provision in the bill is that these parties shall be authorized to make a toll-bridge. First, we authorize them to extend a railroad across that bridge, and connect with a railroad which they say they have a right to build under the laws of Virginia from Georgetown to Alexandria. That is the extent of that. The next proposition is that they are authorized to make a toll-bridge in connection with this, under such restrictions as the engineer department may determine, in other words, to the acceptance of the engineer department in the way of security and safety to travel, and authorized to take toll upon it. That is the entire bill as it comes from the committee on the part of the Senate. We did not think it worth while to authorize them to build a bridge from the opposite side of the river to Alexandria. They say they have got that power from the State of Virginia. Whether they have or not, it is not perhaps the duty of Congress or the interest of Congress to inquire; but we give them substantially what they want: first, to extend the railroad across the bridge, and second, to build a toll-bridge. That is the whole of it.

Mr. CAMERON. There is a great deal more in this bill than the Senator from Maine seems to understand. I am a little surprised that he does not see it, because I tried to explain it to him the other day.

The city of Washington, different from all other towns in the United States and in the world, is isolated from a general railroad connection by a particular connection which it now has. There is but one railroad coming now into this city. With that you can have no connection at all if you go in any direction but one from Washington. Men going north, men going up to where the Senator from Michigan lives, taking the direct route, are compelled to stay three hours in Baltimore every time they pass through, and pay toll to that city besides the detention. This scheme is, I fear, a trick to control the southern side of the District of Columbia as the northern side is now controlled. A few gentlemen have got up this measure who do not intend, as I am told, to use it at all; but they got it up on a speculation, expecting to sell it to a corporation who have bound you here and put a gate on the northern side of the city, so as to enable them to put a gate on the other side of this city.

Within a year there will be another railroad coming into this city; and I desire that that railroad and every other railroad that may be built towards this city, either north or south, shall have a right to connect with all other railroads throughout the United States as every other railroad in the United States has. This bill, after we shall have passed it, will be in a condition to be sold at a handsome premium to this Baltimore corporation on the northern side of us, and then they will make such terms as they please unless such an amendment as I shall offer should be adopted.

Why, sir, two years ago a bill passed Congress legalizing the coming into the District of Columbia of a railroad which had been authorized by the State of Maryland twenty years before. A few persons about the Senate got control of that charter, without intending to put a dollar in it, and the men who are now making that road had to pay them, as I am informed, for the legislation that they got here to enable them to get a charter. I have no evidence of it, but I fear and believe that this will be another such trick as that, and therefore I shall offer an amendment which I have in my hand. If that should be adopted I shall have no objection to the bill, because it authorizes every road to connect with this one, and prevents it from selling out to any corporation which will not check baggage and commute fares with all other railroads coming in and going out of the city.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That any railroad company which shall at any time hereafter construct a railway to the District of Columbia, or any part thereof, or desire to do so, shall be at liberty to connect the same with, and use and pass over with its engines and cars, the railroad and bridge hereby authorized; and that it shall be the duty of said lessees and assigns, and of the said canal company and its assigns, and every other party then operating the road and using the bridge hereby authorized, to commute fares and check baggage over any railroad which may hereafter be constructed as aforesaid and all connections thereof, and at all points to which such commutation and checking shall be desired by the said railroad company so constructing a railroad as aforesaid: Provided, That the price to be charged for such use of said railroad and bridge, and the terms and regulations for said commutation of fares and checking of baggage shall be fixed and determined by referees to be equally chosen by the party then operating said railroad and using said bridge, and the party desiring the use of the same, and the commutation and checking aforesaid; said referees to choose an umpire, if one should become necessary in order to agree upon such price, terms, and regulations: Provided further, however, That no railroad company whatever shall be permitted to use the railroad or bridge hereby authorized, or in any manner connect therewith, or be entitled to any of the provisions of this section, which refuses to commute fares or check baggage over its own line of railroad and any other line of railroad which enters the States of Maryland or Virginia, whose company requests such commutation of fares and checking of baggage, and is willing that the terms and regulations therefor shall be fixed and determined by referees in the manner hereinbefore fully detailed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Ordinarily I would favor the passage of this bill as reported from the Committee of Commerce, because I am in favor of increasing to the last degree every medium of communication between the States and the people of the States; but my own deliberate judgment is that this bill will be made the medium of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad to perfect and extend their monopoly. That railroad is built under the laws of the State of Maryland, and controls the legislation of Maryland; so that it is impossible now to build a railroad from any part of the great West or from the North to the city of Washington without the consent of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. They not only hold this monopoly, but they refuse to make connections with other railroads connecting at Baltimore. There is not the like of it in the United States of America, and we ought to guard against any extension of this monopoly. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad now depends upon the State of Virginia for legislation to get through Virginia. They avail themselves of the liberal policy of Ohio to make connections in Ohio in every direction, and we favor those connections; but they pursue such a course in regard to railroads in Maryland as substantially to separate the city of Washington from all the United States; and this city cannot now be approached by railroad except with the consent of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad.

I have almost every year called attention to a most remarkable thing in connection with this Baltimore and Ohio railroad. A road has been built from the State of Pennsylvania to Baltimore which the people of the Northwest naturally take. We cannot take the Baltimore and Ohio road and get to our homes. We must go over the Northern Central railroad connecting with the Pennsylvania road; and yet this Baltimore and Ohio railroad refuses to make connections with the Northern Central; so that I myself have had several times to go over to Baltimore, with my family, to get through the city of Baltimore, and see that baggage was checked and taken care of, and then come back here again. They refuse to make these connections. I, for one, never intend to allow a bill to be passed here that will enable them still further to control the monopoly over trade North or South until that railroad does what every other railroad in the United States is now required to do.

I know that such is not the purpose of the Committee on Commerce; but look at the effect of this bill. Here is but one bridge across the Potomac river in or near Washington. The long bridge I look upon as substantially an effete structure which ought to be abandoned, and no doubt will be abandoned in time, unless great improvements are made in it. The only way to cross the Potomac is at the heights at Georgetown. Now, suppose the Baltimore and Ohio railroad should get possession of this bridge—the aqueduct bridge, as it is known—and get a toll over that bridge, and construct a line over that bridge, then they have the monopoly of the approach from the South as well as from the North.

I hope that at the next session of Congress, when we shall be freed from political controversies, we shall take up this whole railroad question, and provide means of connection from the capital to all parts of the country, and then this bridge may be vital to the new railroads we may construct under the authority of Congress and with the consent of the States. But, sir, until that is done, I do not wish to pass a law to enable the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, by purchasing the franchise granted in this bill, to control the monopoly of the trade to the South.

There is a great deal of feeling in regard to this matter in the West. It is a thing that we have submitted to; we have complained against it; but we are utterly powerless unless Congress should grant us some relief by compelling this railroad to conform to the ordinary usages of other railroads, and to do what has been done in other places. As long as that railroad controls the Legislature of Maryland and the legislation of Maryland, so that no road can be built over the soil of Maryland except with the assent of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, they will extend their monopoly. They will buy up unquestionably the power conferred by this very bill, plausible as it appears on its face, and they will have the control of the southern extension just as they now have of the northern extension. If this road from here to Alexandria gets in the power of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company they will have then the monopoly of every approach to Washington. There is no authority now under existing law to make any railroads here or any bridge.

I do not say that it is the purpose of the Committee on Commerce—I know it is not their purpose—to favor the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in this way; but I very much fear they will avail themselves of it, and then do what the Committee on Commerce do not desire them to do. The Committee on Commerce undoubtedly desire to promote communication between the several States. If this bill goes over until next winter I shall be very willing to vote for a proposition that will authorize any railroad company to build a railroad bridge on the foundations of the aqueduct bridge, and to make that a free mode of communication connecting with all railroads that may be built to or from Washington. Then, I think, it will accomplish a very good purpose, and will promote communication between the States.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Having stated the objects of this bill and its scope to the Senate, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania feels himself authorized to tell the Senate that the committee do not understand the effect of this measure. What has he discovered here, what has anybody discovered here to alarm the Senate? The Baltimore and Ohio railroad are going to take possession of Congress! Well, sir, I am not conscious of it; I have never seen their power here, and do not know anything about it. Sir, that is the biggest bugaboo in the world to apply to such a measure as this. What is this bill? Three quarters of a century ago Congress authorized a canal between here and Alexandria. Since that time the State of Virginia has authorized a railroad alongside of it up to the southern shore of the Potomac. Now, gentlemen who say they are lessees of that road, and have succeeded to the rights of the Government in the canal, and the rights of the Legislature of Virginia in the road, want to extend the railroad across a bridge that is already authorized by an act of Congress, and to have it declared a lawful structure. That is all. And the Senator from Pennsylvania rises here and arraigns a committee of the body for not understanding that there is some extraordinary thing about to be done. How? A great monopoly is going to get possession of it. How, sir? Tell us how, if you know.

Mr. CAMERON. I will tell you after a while.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator has examined it and understands it, and think the committee do not, why not tell us what it is, and not undertake to frighten the Senate from its propriety by holding up a monopoly.

Now, let us come back a moment to this question. You are about to say that persons who have succeeded to certain rights under this Government, and under the government of Virginia, shall have a right to run a railroad across a bridge already built by your authority from the Georgetown side to the other side of the river. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania says if you do that this great monopoly will get possession of it, and will shut up the gates of the South, and nobody can open the gates but that road. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania, or the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator, tell me how they are to do that? Look at this bill. Is there any right of connection with this road? Does this bill give the Baltimore and Ohio road or any other road any right to connect with it whatever? Not a bit of it. Is there any lawyer here or anywhere who will say that they have such right unless it is given? Of course not. There is not the slightest right under heaven to connect with it. That is the answer to that, and the whole of it. Whenever these people choose to come here and ask for the right to connect, then the honorable Senator will be right in saying "I object to this road having the exclusive right to connect with this company; there are other roads in the country that ought to share in it." That is the answer to the whole argument of my honorable friend from Pennsylvania.

Now, to my astonishment, my friend from Ohio takes up the strain, and he says that we are in danger really of this great monopoly. Why? He says they will not check the baggage through now to the Northwest. I think that is very illiberal in them, to say the least of it; but how are we to settle these relations on this little question of crossing the river? Are we here to settle the relations between the Northern Central and the Baltimore and Ohio roads? Is that our business on this particular measure? Has it come to pass that no legislation, however remote, can be done in the District of Columbia touching any railroad unless the Northern Central and the Baltimore and Ohio roads must be heard, and their interests must be heard, and that we must hold audience with these august institutions before we allow ourselves to say whether we will cross the Potomac by a toll-bridge? That is this proposition.

My honorable friend from Ohio says if they get possession of this road, what will happen? Who can tell? They will then have the right of way to the South. Suppose they do. Cannot we cross the river where we please the next day after? Suppose that were all true, what a frightful thing it would be! Does the honorable Senator know that right here under our nose they cross every day? Does the honorable Senator know that Congress chartered a road within the last five years which runs regularly between here and Richmond daily? And yet the earth stands; the Capitol of the United States is secure. I have heard a great deal of this monopoly. One would have supposed from the wonderful power and capacity of this road that they would own Virginia and all its railways before this; but they do not own the road to which I refer. I have not heard any intimation that they have any control over this road. And yet we are told that we cannot legislate to authorize the building of a toll bridge for fear this great monopoly which breaks the connections with the Northern Central will get control of the road and block the whole travel to the South.

Now, sir, I submit that those fears and apprehensions are not worthy of the Senate of the United States on a bill of this sort. I submit that they are groundless. I submit that it affects nobody's rights. And so as to what the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania said to me on this subject. I heard him patiently and respectfully, as I always do, and disposed to take his views so far as practicable, and I have shorn this bill of everything under heaven except simply the right to cross that bridge. There is no right whatever of connection on this side, and I say to that Senator and the Senate I have not the slightest belief that either that road or any other road can connect with it on this side unless they come here and get your authority. Everybody knows they cannot do it. That is precisely what there is in this bill.

What does my friend from Pennsylvania want? If he is afraid that the Baltimore and Ohio railroad will buy this road, and will get a right to connect which no other road has a right to do, I am perfectly willing to negative all such right as that, and I will submit such a proposition as this to the honorable Senator, which I think will answer that purpose:

And be it further enacted, That such company shall not grant to any one railroad company any right of connection or any privilege whatever to the exclusion of any other railroad company.

Believing as I do that no company has any such right, opposed as I am to granting in this bill any right of this sort, I am disposed to gratify this apprehension of the honorable Senator and go so far as expressly to deny the right of granting to one road what is not granted to another. But any one will see that the proposition which the honorable Senator offers is altogether a very extraordinary proposition to put upon a bill of this kind. The machinery which he proposes, the conditions and terms are such as I think the Senate would agree would be unusual. If this is satisfactory to the honorable Senator I will propose it.

Mr. CAMERON. It is not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I offer it as a substitute for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask if all parties will not agree that this bill should now go over with a view to have an executive session. I do not wish to interfere with the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Make that motion.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust the Senator will allow me a word in reply to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we can finish the bill in a short time.

Mr. SUMNER. I withdraw my motion for the present, but give notice that I shall renew it.

Mr. CAMERON. I must say, with all deference to the Senator from Maine, that he has shown a great deal more heat on this subject than he usually does, and much more than the subject, to my mind, warrants. The Senator said that I called upon him some years ago to ask for the passage of a bill he then had under consideration; and from the manner in which he spoke of it it might be supposed that I attempted to ask that of him which was not proper.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Oh, no.

Mr. CAMERON. I came to him as the chairman of a committee of the Senate who were considering a bill in which I felt a deep interest. My interest was that of a citizen of the country.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the Senator will allow me to say—

Mr. CAMERON. If I have said anything wrong I shall be glad to be corrected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was the farthest thing possible in my mind to intimate that the honorable Senator had approached me in any but the most proper spirit, and I received it in that way.

Mr. CAMERON. I wish to say what I have to say in reply to the Senator. I came here as a citizen desirous of having communication with this city. The State of Maryland some twenty years before had passed a law authorizing a railroad from the city of Baltimore to Aquia creek. That law could be made useful if we could get the right to connect with the city of Washington. I asked the Senator from Maine to pass a bill giving that right. For some reason or other he refused to do so, and as I said before, the next year that bill was passed, and some people about the Senate—not Senators, but some people about the Senate—took possession of the charter and refused to give it to anybody but the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, unless they were paid a large sum of money for it. In order to make that connection that sum of money was paid to those people, and now the right to come here is in the hands of men who, within the last few days, have made such arrangements as will, within a year and a half more, bring another railroad to Washington.

Now, as to the connection here, what I desire is that every railroad wishing to connect with the South shall have permission to go across that bridge.

The Senator from Maine is incorrect in another particular. He says the Baltimore and Ohio road have no right to connect with this road. By their charter they have a right to connect with any railroad here, in Virginia, or in Maryland, as he will find if he looks it up. They can connect there, and they can make their own terms, or at least they can negotiate for terms. All I desire is to permit all railroads coming here to have the right to pass over that railroad bridge upon equal terms. I desire also that this company shall be prevented from selling their charter privileges to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, or any other railroad which shall not check baggage or commute fares as other railroads do. My proposition is a perfectly fair one, and if the gentlemen who are interested in this matter had nothing but fairness in their minds they would not object to it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. To whom does the Senator refer when he says that the persons interested were not prompted by fairness or they would not object to his proposition?

Mr. CAMERON. The people who own the charter. That is my conclusion. I have conversed with them all. I have assured them that I had no desire to interfere with them, if they would do as I think they ought to do, allow everybody to connect with them and not sell their charter to people who will not make connections. My impression and my strong belief is that they will sell out this charter to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad; for to that company it will be of immense importance, as by means of it they can keep the connection south as they have hitherto done the connection north.

Mr. SUMNER. I now renew my motion for an executive session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think we can get a vote now.

Mr. SUMNER. I think we had better proceed to the consideration of executive business. We must get that business out of the way.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall be compelled to object to that until we can get a vote on House bill No. 768, and I hope the motion for an executive session will not be precipitated upon us this morning until we can get a vote on that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion for an executive session is not debatable.

Mr. CHANDLER. We can get a vote on this bill now, and I hope the Senator will withdraw his motion.

Mr. SUMNER. I must persist in my motion. It is well known to the Senate that there is important business in executive session requiring two or three hours.

Mr. CHANDLER. Allow this to be disposed of first.

Mr. SUMNER. This will be in order as soon as we get out of executive session.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We have agreed upon a proposition which will relieve this bill of all embarrassment, and we can pass it without further debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. SUMNER. I do for the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, which will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as modified, which was to insert as an additional section the following:

And be it further enacted, That said company shall not grant to any railroad or other corporation the exclusive right to transfer passengers or freight over said railroad bridge, and any privilege granted to one corporation shall be extended to all who may make application for such privilege on equal terms, and shall not sell, transfer, or lease their corporate rights.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

HISTORY OF THE MONITOR.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to communicate to the Senate the facts concerning the construction of the iron-clad Monitor, including a copy of the proposal to build said vessel, a copy of the contract, a statement of the amount paid for her construction, the time and amount of each payment, and any other facts necessary for a full history of the origin and construction of this memorable vessel.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1448) making appropriations for certain executive expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 1447) granting the right of way to certain railroad companies over the military reservation at Fort Leavenworth was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to have that bill put on its passage now.

Mr. POMEROY. I hope it will be passed at once.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at the present time. Is there any objection?

Mr. CONNESS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1212) to further amend the postal laws.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said bill, and appointed Mr. JOHN HILL of New Jersey, Mr. JOHN F. FARNSWORTH of Illinois, and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD of New York, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House fixing the day of the adjournment of the present session of Congress.

The message further returned, in compliance with a request of the Senate, the bill (H. R. No. 783) for the relief of Samuel Pierce.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 543) to provide for the farther issue of temporary loan certificates for the purpose of redeeming and retiring the remainder of the outstanding compound-interest notes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 23d instant approved and signed the following bill and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 352) to authorize the temporary supplying of vacancies in the Executive Departments; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) for the restoration of Commander Aaron K. Hughes, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. I have a bill on my table which I desire to move, but I forbear to take advantage—

Mr. CONNESS. There is nothing before the Senate, I believe.

Mr. SUMNER. I have the floor. If the Senator calls me to order, he must make his point of order. I now renew the motion which I made some moments ago, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUMNER. Briefly remarking—

Mr. CONNESS. I object to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No argument can be made on the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; the Senate will take notice that there is executive business.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall not go into executive session.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 29, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Cragin, Doolittle, Drake, Ferry, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, McCreery, Morgan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson of New Hampshire, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomerooy, Sawyer, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, Vickers, Welch, Whyte, and Willey—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Ramsey, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Tipton, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cameron, Cattell, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Morton, Norton, Nye, Osborn, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Sausbury, Thayer, Van Winkle, and Yates—18.

So the motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1433) to amend an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, disagreed to by the Senate, asked a conference on the disagreement of the two Houses on the said bill, and had appointed Mr. R. C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. JOHN A. LOGAN of Illinois, and Mr. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, &c.; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 433) authorizing the trustees of Union Chapel of the Methodist Episcopal church in the city of Washington to mortgage their property for church purposes;

A bill (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 21, 1864, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States;"

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the rebellion; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to carry into effect the resolution approved March 2, 1867, providing for the exchange of certain public documents.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. PATTERSON, of New Hampshire, from the joint select Committee on Retrenchment, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 175) relative to the recent contract for stationery for the Department of the Interior. The joint resolution was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, disagreed to by the Senate and insisted on by the House: and,

On motion by Mr. SHERMAN,

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. WILLIAMS, managers on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of executive business; and after some hours spent therein, the doors were reopened at five o'clock, and the Senate took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of considering at the evening session bills reported from the Committee on Claims.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. VAN WINKLE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1010) relating to pensions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, numbered as follows: 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with amendments as follows: strike out all after the word "garrison," in line ten of the amendment, to the end of line twelve; also, strike out all after the word "station," in line eighteen of the amendment; and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-first amendment, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: strike out all after the enacting clause of the amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the third section of an act entitled 'An act increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes,' approved July 25, 1866, shall be construed as to place all pensioners whose right thereto accrued subsequently to the Revolution and prior to the 4th day of March, 1861, on the same footing as to rate of pension from and after the passage of said act, as those who have been pensioned under acts passed since said 4th day of March, 1861; and the widows of revolutionary soldiers and sailors, and soldiers and sailors now receiving a less sum, shall hereafter be paid at the rate of eight dollars per month;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-second amendment, and agree to the same, with an amendment, namely: strike out after line eleven of the amendment the following: "and in all cases pensions heretofore or hereafter granted by special acts of Congress shall be subject to be varied in amount according to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and insert the same as an additional section; and that the Senate agree to the same.

P. G. VAN WINKLE, JOSEPH S. FOWLER,
ALEXANDER RAMSEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SIDNEY PERHAM,
D. FOLSLEY,
L. S. TRIMBLE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 168) for the relief of John Montgomery, reported it without amendment.

WHARVES AT OSWEGO.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to take up House joint resolution No. 296. It is a very brief resolution, and has passed the House of Representatives. It will take but a few moments.

Mr. RAMSEY. I wish to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. MORGAN. It will not take five minutes to pass this resolution.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well; I give way to the Senator from New York. He has been indulgent this session; but I would not give way to anybody else. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 296) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York. The preamble recites that the common council of the city of Oswego, in the State of New York, by resolutions unanimously adopted April 7, 1868, and May 12, 1868, in pursuance of the authority granted them by the Legislature of New York in the charter of the city, have given permission to the owners of lots eleven and twelve, also of lots, thirteen, fourteen, eighty-one, and eighty-two, and of lots fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, and eighteen, in fortification block No. 2, in the first ward of the city, to construct wharves in front of the lots, seventy feet in width, and extending northerly so that the north end of the wharves may be on a line with the north line of the Ontario elevator pier, but not less than two hundred and fifty feet distant from the nearest point of the United States pier, which wharves will extend into the navigable waters of the harbor. The joint resolution, therefore, gives the assent of the United States, so far as Congress has power to give the same, to the owners of the lots above mentioned, to construct the wharves in accordance with the terms of the resolutions, subject, however, to the approval of the engineer department of the Army.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN STEAM LINE TO EUROPE.

Mr. RAMSEY. There is a report of a committee of conference on the table, which always has preference, and I ask to have it acted upon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant steamships between New York and one or more European ports, have had the same under consideration, and agree to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreements to the second and third amendments of the Senate.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first, fourth, and fifth amendments with the following amendments, to wit:

In line twelve, page 1, of engrossed bill strike out "twenty," and insert "fifteen."

In line fourteen, page 3, of the engrossed bill strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen."

In line twenty-six, page 5, strike out "twenty," and insert "fifteen."

JOHN HILL,

J. F. FARNSWORTH,

FERNANDO WOOD,

Managers on the part of the House.

ALEXANDER RAMSEY,

J. W. PATTERSON,

ALEXANDER G. CATTELL,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I am very sorry that the committee who had charge of this bill have made such a report. The Senate struck out "twenty" years and inserted "ten," and I doubt very much whether the bill could have passed the Senate as it originally stood, or for fifteen years. It gives a lien upon the postages of the United States for fifteen years of time. At that time the honorable Senator from Minnesota and myself will be in heaven or somewhere else. In the mean time the postages are mortgaged and bonds issued on the faith of that mortgage. I regard it myself, although entirely friendly to the legislation, as very bad legislation, and I desire to put that expression on record in regard to it.

Mr. RAMSEY. My honorable friend from California will have no brighter monument in the future than that which he has entitled himself to in establishing the line from San Francisco to Yokohama and Hong Kong, and that costs $500,000 a year for monthly trips.

Mr. CONNESS. For ten years.

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, for ten years, but costing $500,000 a year. These people, for all the mails, and carry them if you please weekly between New York and Southampton or Queenstown, and so on, get only about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. CONNESS. How do you know?

Mr. RAMSEY. I have it here with the high postages at this time. Fifty-two round trips—

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit me, I give way before his logic and his persuasion. I have no further objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

PURCHASE OF TERRITORY FROM RUSSIA.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to take up House bill No. 1261.

Mr. SUMNER. I desire to make a report from a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of a committee of conference is a privileged question.

Mr. SUMNER. The conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill known as the Alaska appropriation bill have directed me to make the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 1096) entitled "An act making an appropriation of money to carry into effect the treaty with Russia of March 30, 1867," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its first amendment and agree to the preamble of the bill with amendments, as follows: after the word "Russia," in the fourth line, insert the following words: "and the Senate thereafter gave its advice and consent to said treaty," and strike out all after the words "United States," in the twelfth line, and insert instead thereof the following words, "and whereas said stipulations cannot be carried into full force and effect except by legislation, to which the consent of both Houses of Congress is necessary;" and the House agree to the same, as amended.

And they further recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

CHARLES SUMNER,

O. P. MORTON,

J. R. DOOLITTLE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

N. P. BANKS,

W. LOUGHRIDGE,

S. J. RANDALL,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I now ask that my bill be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1261) amendatory of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Committee on the Judiciary have reported an amendment as a substitute for the bill. I presume it is unnecessary to read the original bill.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863, so far as the same relate to the removal of causes from the State to the Federal courts, be, and the same are hereby, declared to extend to any suit or action at law or prosecution, civil or criminal, which has been or shall be commenced in any State court against the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, or of any railway, or of any line of transportation, firm, or corporation engaged in business as common carriers of goods, wares, or merchandise, for any loss or damage which may have happened to any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, which shall have been delivered to any such owner or owners of any ship or vessel, or any railway, or of any line of transportation, firm, or corporation, engaged in business as common carriers, where such loss or damage shall have been occasioned by the acts of those engaged in hostility to the Government of the United States during the late rebellion, or where such loss or damage shall have been occasioned by any of the forces of the United States, or by any officer in command of such forces: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to affect any contract of insurance for war risks which may have been made with reference to any goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall have been so destroyed.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This subject was very thoroughly considered in the Committee on the Judiciary, and when the committee was full the measure never had the assent of the committee. It is now reported by a majority of the committee in attendance when the matter was last considered. It is known to the Senate, I presume, that Mr. Johnson, one of the members of that committee, has left the Senate, and Mr. EDMUNDS, another member of the committee, is absent; and the committee consisting of but five members, it received the assent of a majority of that committee. I was opposed to it, and I will state to the Senate what this bill is. I regard it as an important bill affecting the jurisdiction of the United States courts. I am aware that at this stage of the session, and in the present temper of the Senate, it will be very difficult to get attention to anything I shall say. I am aware that a person who gets the floor at this stage of the session is very likely to have his bill passed, if he announces that it comes from a committee; and hence I considered it to be my duty to state to the Senate that when the committee was full this bill did not command the assent of the committee. It proposes to confer upon the United States courts jurisdiction never heretofore given in a class of cases which, if it can be given, will confer all the jurisdiction in every case that you can imagine almost upon the United States courts, and you might as well abolish all the State tribunals. Under the provisions of the bill as it is now proposed to pass it a corporation created in the State of Illinois or any other State has a right to take a case into the United States court when it is sued by a citizen of Illinois, or in any other State, any corporation or railroad company, or steamship company, or other company engaged in transporting passengers, incorporated by a State, when it is sued in a State court has a right, under the provisions of this bill, to take the case into the courts of the United States. Can any one tell me where the authority comes from to pass such a bill as that?

Mr. HOWE. I hope this bill, if the Senator wishes to debate it, will be allowed to go over until a better opportunity can be given for the debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will say to my friend from Wisconsin that I do not wish to debate it; I do not wish to delay it. I shall probably not occupy more than five or ten minutes. It is a bill of so important a character that, in my judgment, it should be understood by the Senate before it is permitted to become a law; and when I have stated what the bill is, if I can get the attention of the Senate for five or ten minutes, if they think proper to pass it I have no more to say about it.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from New Jersey will have to reply.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall have to correct the statements the Senator from Illinois makes.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senator from Illinois will allow this bill to be postponed, and let us proceed to the business of the evening.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us dispose of this first.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the bill is such as the Senator from Illinois represents it to be, it cannot pass without opposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think there will be any opposition to the bill when it is understood. As to its not passing the committee, there was a majority of the committee opposed to the original bill, and a majority of the committee in favor of this amendment which is reported. As to the effect of the bill, it is simply this—I can state it in one minute—that where the defense of an individual or of a corporation is that the property which they were transporting was destroyed by reason of the war, in that case the question of the effect of the war may be taken from the State courts to the Federal courts, which is in strict compliance with the provision of the Constitution of the United States; and that is the whole case.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, Mr. President, let us see if that is the whole case. The Senator has made his statement. Now we will read the bill. The Senator has stated what I was not aware of. I reiterate the statement, although it will contradict the statement of my friend from New Jersey, who means to be entirely accurate, that to my knowledge, in a full committee, this amendment never had the assent of a majority. If it had I cannot conceive when it was. I certainly never knew it. I think the Senator from New Jersey, so careful as he ordinarily is, is mistaken in this instance. I cannot understand who constituted the majority of the committee when it was agreed to. It certainly was never known to me. I know that the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] and the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] and myself were all opposed to the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has never been agreed to in committee when the Senator from Maryland was present in that committee, so far as my knowledge goes. The Senator from Maryland has not been with us for the last week or two upon the committee. I know not what may have been said in the Senate.

That is immaterial, however. I only mention that incidentally, that the Senate may not take this bill without examination. Now, let us see what the bill is:

That the provisions of an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus and regulating judicial proceeding in certain cases," approved March 3, 1863—

Mr. HOWE. I must interpose, with the leave of the Senator, and move to lay this bill on the table for the present, until the business of the evening is disposed of. I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I appeal to the Senator to withdraw that motion. Let it be laid aside informally; that will answer the purpose.

Mr. HOWE. If the whole Senate will agree that it lay aside informally, I have no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to its being laid aside informally, for then it can be called up at any moment when I am not present. I wish to state what the bill is, and shall take no unnecessary time in doing it.

Mr. HOWE. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks he erred, as the Senate were to consider private bills this evening, in not recognizing the head of that committee at the opening of the session. The question is on laying the bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1322.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really hope that the Senate will not proceed to the consideration of private claims at this period of the session. If we do, we cannot possibly get through with our business. There is a great deal of business to do, and if any measures are to go over those ought to go over until the next session. We have public business that we must do, and although I believe there was a sort of understanding as to to-night yet I really think it would not be just to the public business or to ourselves to take up these private claims at this period of the session when we have got so little time, and so much to do that must necessarily be attended to. I really hope it will not be done.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to make an appeal to the Senator from Wisconsin. I have been trying to get the floor for some days past, but have not succeeded, in order to call up a little bill to remove disabilities from two members of Congress. It is important that it should go through, and I presume there will be no objection to it. It has got but four names in it, and I have been trying hard for a week to get the floor.

Mr. HOWE. I am a little surprised at the objection made by the Senator from Maine. This afternoon the Senate agreed that this evening should be assigned to business reported from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was no party to it.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know whether the Senator was a party to it or not; but the Senate did it, and I hope the Senator is prepared to acquiesce in the decision of the Senate. Of course, they can recall the vote or reconsider it. I know that very well; but I have struggled as hard as I could, without seeming to be impertinent, to get a fair share of attention to the business of the Committee on Claims. I have no interest in the business of the committee, but I do not wish to be held up and held responsible for utter inefficiency and incapacity in the conduct of that business. The Senate will bear me witness that we have occupied but very little of its time during this protracted session. And now what is the objection to considering these bills this evening? Our individual convenience, it is true, would be promoted by leaving here early and going home; that is all. There is time enough to dispose of this business and all the business there is to be transacted in executive session, and I think in a very short time the business that I intended to lay before the Senate can be disposed of this evening. I hope the Senate will indulge me to that extent. If they will not, I cannot help it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I really do not like to interfere with my friend; but he has already had time more than once to call up his bills and has had bills before the Senate, and has occupied the attention of the Senate for some hours in relation to those bills. My only objection is that there is not time. If we had time to dispose of these bills and the general business before us I would not say a word; but I am satisfied we have not got it unless we stay here all night. The idea was not to my mind that we were to go home, but that we would go into executive session and try to dispose of the executive business in which we made some slight progress in the afternoon. I think if we intend to adjourn on Monday, and we cannot help it, because we have come to an agreement between the two Houses, the only way in which we can avoid being called together again is to go on with the executive business and dispose of it; and I really do not think that private claims, for they are all private, at this period of the session, when the next session is so near, should interfere with the general business of the country which is clearly of more importance. I will move, therefore, that the Senate—

Mr. STEWART. Let me pass my little bill first.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That "little bill" is of no more importance than any other; and if I were to give way to everybody who wants to pass a little bill we should never get through. I am willing to let the Senate decide. If there is time enough to go on with these bills I am perfectly content. I only make the motion with reference to getting through and disposing of the business that is absolutely indispensable. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. STEWART. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOWE. I desire to have the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. It seems to me we had better not go into executive session now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debateable.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg pardon; I thought it was.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Ferry, Fessenden, Hendricks, McCreery, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Welch, and Yates—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Cattell, Cole, Conkling, Conness, Corbett, Doolittle, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Harris, Howard, Howe, McDonald, Morgan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson of Tennessee, Sawyer, Stewart, Thayer, Tipton, Vickers, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Bayard, Chandler, Cragin, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Henderson, Kellogg, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Osborn, Pool, Rice, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, and Whyte—22.

So the motion was not agreed to.

MAJOR F. F. STEVENS.

Mr. HOWE. I now renew my motion to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1322.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1322) for the relief of Major F. F. Stevens, assistant paymaster United States Army. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Paymaster General's office and the Treasury Department in the settlement of the accounts of Major F. F. Stevens, late an assistant paymaster of the United States Army, to credit to him the sum of $3,078 63 as of the 1st April, 1867, for that amount of public money in his hands on that day, lost by the burning of the steamer Alabama on the Mississippi river, provided they are of opinion that the allowance should be made.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. W. WALKER.

Mr. HOWE. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 9.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 9) in favor of A. W. Walker was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to A. W. Walker, of Tennessee, the full amount of pay allowed by law to a captain of infantry for one year, less $750, the amount received by him while acting as scout and spy for the Union Army.

Mr. HOWE. The report in that case is adverse. I move that the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES.

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to the Senator from Wisconsin to give way for one moment to allow me to pass a little bill removing the disabilities of two members of Congress. The House have added one other name and we propose to add another.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to pass a little pension bill.

Mr. STEWART. If you object to this bill when it is read we will not pass it.

Mr. POMEROY. I think we ought to relieve those two members of Congress.

Mr. HOWE. I have no objection if this business is not postponed.

Mr. STEWART. I move, then, to take up House bill No. 1446.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1446) to relieve from legal and political disabilities Simeon Corley, John Milledge, and Michael Hahn. It proposes to remove all legal and political disabilities imposed by the United States upon Simeon Corley, a citizen of South Carolina; John Milledge, of Augusta, Georgia, and Michael Hahn, of New Orleans, Louisiana.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment, in line six, after "Louisiana," to insert "and P. M. B. Young, of Georgia."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAWYER. I move to amend the bill by inserting after "South Carolina," in the fourth line, the following:

And all county officers elected under the new constitution of the State of South Carolina at the recent election in that State, so far as such officers elect rest under such disabilities.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to hear from the Senator a statement in regard to that amendment.

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. President, there are some fifteen or sixteen county officers who have been elected by the people of South Carolina who cannot qualify on account of their being thrown out by the fourteenth amendment. It is absolutely necessary that their disabilities should be relieved in order that the places may be filled. If new elections are ordered we will be obliged to elect the same class of men, and the offices will have to go unfilled until the next session of Congress. It is in that view alone that I bring the amendment before the Senate at this time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I see no reason against extending this amendment to all these reconstructed States. If the principle is correct as to South Carolina, it must be equally correct as to the other States. Where people of a State under the reconstruction laws, or of any particular district, have selected an officer to discharge some local office there, it seems to me there is no public objection to permitting him to discharge its duties. Otherwise, we narrow the popular privileges. Now, after having confined the right of suffrage within narrow limits, so far as the white population are concerned, after having secured the incorporation in the new constitution of a very severe test, as we know to be the fact, because they have been laid before us, it seems to me it will be proper for Congress to relieve the people of all those States from the inconvenience under which they suffer, which prevailed in South Carolina to that extent that the honorable Senator has offered an amendment applying to that State.

Mr. STEWART. With the permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania, it would hardly be fair to the Senator from Wisconsin, who has a special order, to have a matter of this kind brought before us for discussion. There will be more or less discussion upon it; and I hope the Senator from South Carolina will withdraw the amendment for the present, and put it on some bill where it can be considered in connection with that subject, inasmuch as the House are desirous to relieve these members of Congress, and permit them to take their seats.

Mr. SAWYER. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I must call attention to a case very well known, occurring in the House at the present session, the case of John Young Brown, of Kentucky. Here is a bill relieving the political disabilities of certain gentlemen elected to the House of Representatives, as I understand. Now, we have had sent to us, among the published documents of the House, the case of John Young Brown, who, it seems, acted with the Union side during most of the war, but was held by the House not to be able to take the oath of July 2, 1862, because he made a certain speech.

Mr. STEWART. Let me state to the Senator from Pennsylvania the facts with regard to this particular bill. There was one Democrat elected on the Democratic ticket, Mr. Young, of Georgia, and although he is a Democrat, elected on that ticket, and was a rebel general in the war, yet he is recommended by General Grant and General Meade, and the Reconstruction Committee of the House have just sent a letter here requesting the passage of the bill with the insertion of his name, and the Senator from Ohio has also sent several letters on the subject. I hope, therefore, that the Senator will let the bill go through with a Democrat and a Republican. There is nothing unfair about this particular bill, and I hope it will not interfere with the business of the evening. I ask the Senator not to press an amendment on this bill, or debate it. We shall have some other measure before us which we can discuss.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I shall not occupy time. I am not accustomed to speak at great length after exhausting the merits of the points. Here is a bill, I repeat, to relieve disabilities of members elected to the present House, and here is a well-known case, perfectly familiar to the Senate, coming within this class. The amendment which was offered by the Senator from South Carolina, which has been withdrawn, related to a different class of persons entirely, local officers selected in the southern States. I call attention to a case of a member elected from Kentucky to the House of Representatives, and I submit that in agreeing to this bill from the House it will be but reasonable to include all the known cases falling under the same general character clearly. This case of Mr. Brown, of Kentucky, is one of much more merit, so far as I understand it, than these other cases. His was not the case of an officer who had served in the rebel armies, not the case of a man who had taken persistently a position against us during the whole war, and contributed to the extent of his ability and of his influence to its success—

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator give way to a motion to lay this bill on the table?

Mr. BUCKALEW. Oh, no, sir. I am almost done. I simply want to state the case with reference to the amendment I propose to submit, and I do not intend to detain the Senate long.

In the case of Mr. Brown, at a time when Kentucky had very foolishly assumed a position of so-called neutrality, when she intended to stop the torrent of war by assuming and maintaining an independent attitude, Mr. Brown, in a public speech, spoke of resisting the entrance of Federal troops as well as of confederate troops within the limits of that State. It was a mistaken policy which he and others adopted; but it was temporary; it was for the moment; and that position was abandoned by him, and his loyalty afterward during the real pressure of the war was unquestioned. And yet he was precluded from taking the iron-clad oath and taking his seat because of that speech made about the time of the outbreak of hostilities, and when the fact was that he abandoned, along with the great mass of the inhabitants of his State, the position they proposed to assume.

Now, sir, I propose to amend the bill by adding to the other names the name of John Young Brown, of Kentucky. Then we can send the bill back corrected to the House, and applying to all cases of members elected to the present House of Representatives of those several States; and by this amendment we shall include the most meritorious of all the cases which have been brought to our notice. In that form I have no objection to voting for the bill. I think it is but reasonable that where the people of those States have chosen men to the House of Representatives, and thereby indicated to us that they are persons of merit, loyal to the Government, relief should be afforded; but it is manifestly unjust and unfair to select out some cases and to leave others unprovided for by our law.

Mr. HOWE. I move that this bill lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 33, noes 7.

SALLY C. NORTHRUP.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 722, for the relief of Sally C. Northrup.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HOWE. The bill has been read heretofore.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. G. OLIVAR.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1366.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1366) for the relief of Captain A. G. Olivar. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Captain A. G. Olivar the sum of $2,010, being the full amount stolen from him the 13th of May, 1864, which was Government funds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS W. MILLER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1365.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1365) for the relief of Captain Thomas W. Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Thomas W. Miller, late captain and acting aid to Brigadier General L. Cutler, late of the Army of the Potomac, the sum of $529 88, in full for military services from the 13th of May to the 7th of August, 1863, inclusive, and for private horse killed in action at the battle of Gettysburg.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE W. BRIDGES.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 834.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 834) for the relief of Hon. George W. Bridges, a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for payment by the Treasurer of the United States to Hon. George W. Bridges, late a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress from the State of Tennessee, of $1,685 10, in full compensation and payment of his claim for pay as a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, deducted for loss of time, occasioned by his arrest by rebel authority while on his way to the capital.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PALEMON JOHN.

Mr. HOWE. House bill No. 423, passed some time since, for the relief of Palemon John. A motion to reconsider was entered. I should like to have that motion now disposed of.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to make an explanation. I have the papers in that case at my room and have read them through. I have also obtained a statement from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in relation to the account on which the question arises. I had intended to compare them and bring the papers over here. As I understand, the only evidence of the amount is the oath of the applicant. I propose to do this, to examine these papers, and bring them over to-morrow, and with a brief statement I will then submit the question to the Senate. I will agree to call it up myself to-morrow. It will take but a moment.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will bear in mind that I have reminded him of this case several times, and it is getting to be near the close of the session. I hope he will not disappoint me to-morrow.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Certainly not.

Mr. CAMERON. I trust my colleague will not object to the passage of this bill. It is a perfectly fair bill. The man is an officer of the Government; he put the money in the post office, and had the letter registered, and the money was seen by the postmaster; it was lost in the mail. My colleague knows all the facts.

Mr. BUCKALEW. My colleague will be fully satisfied to-morrow with reference to the subject. I do not want to go into an explanation of it now. I assure him he will be entirely satisfied.

Mr. CAMERON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill will be laid aside for the present.

JOSEPH SEGAR.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 675.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Joseph Segar was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like some explanation of the bill. A claim of this magnitude, and based upon items that must be uncertain in amount, it seems to me ought to be determined by the Court of Claims or by some tribunal other than a committee of the Senate. Necessarily, our committees must act upon ex parte affidavits or papers. It seems to me that a claim of this character and magnitude ought to be sent to some other tribunal for decision.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the chairman of the committee to state, as he can in a word, no doubt, what this claim is in substance. It seems to be a large amount for the occupation of land by troops, and it belongs to a very dangerous class of claims.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from West Virginia will state more succinctly than I can the facts in this case.

Mr. WILLEY. The report in detail has been lying on the tables of Senators for three or four weeks. It gives the evidence pretty much in detail. Mr. Segar owns a farm near Fortress Monroe in Virginia, four hundred and forty-seven acres. About the 24th day of May, 1861, the military authorities having landed troops at that point, and being desirous to have a camping ground, and a place for hospitals, and being without supplies, in the first place sent a military commission upon the farm of Mr. Segar, and took in possession his mules, his wagons, his corn, &c., to the value of some six or seven thousand dollars according to their own estimate, which was duly reported to the Quartermaster General, and was all paid with the exception of $1,560, and that would have been paid but for the interposition of the act of 1867, forbidding any further payments to any parties living within States lately in insurrection; so that in regard to $1,560 there is no question of doubt.

The military authorities took possession of this farm, consisting of four hundred and forty-seven acres; they erected camps upon it; they erected hospitals upon it; they made it a drilling ground. They took possession of it by virtue of a military order in due form. They turned Mr. Segar out of his comfortable home, and he had to find quarters for himself and his family elsewhere. He left a library, the accumulation of all his life; he left his furniture there, and when he returned his library was gone and his furniture was gone. For neither of these does he make any charge, because they were undoubtedly the depredations of unauthorized soldiers. But after the collapse of the rebellion, by military orders at Richmond, under command of General Terry, a commission was appointed, who went upon the premises, took evidence in order to ascertain what was a fair compensation for the use and occupation of the farm of Mr. Segar during the time the military authorities had it in possession, and they brought in an estimate of some twenty thousand dollars upon the evidence, which they give in detail in their report, and a synopsis of which is in the report of the committee in this case, which has been placed on the desk of each member of the Senate.

There was a tract of woodland upon that farm. The military forces, while they occupied the farm, for the purpose of supplying themselves with fuel cut down nearly all the timber upon this land and used it for fuel. There was a dispute about the quantity of timber land. I directed and procured an actual survey of the whole land, and of what was in dispute, and leaving out the amount of timber land in dispute there were seventy-seven and a quarter acres of woodland undisputed besides four hundred and forty-seven acres of the farm. The troops also destroyed six miles of fence. They destroyed all of Mr. Segar's outbuildings.

They dug up his farm by excavations here and there. I will read a recapitulation of the evidence which I made myself as about the shortest abstract and statement which I could make of the whole case. Here it is:

"In reference to quartermaster stores and commissary subsistence there seems clearly to be due and unpaid a balance of $1,560."

Allow me to state here that this farm was never for one moment within the enemy's lines; it was always within our lines. Allow me further to state that it was excepted by Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, reserved as loyal territory:

"II. In reference to use and occupation of farm: The farm consisted of four hundred and forty-seven acres, including woodland. Of this about three hundred acres were under cultivation and used for pasturage. The annual value for use and occupation is estimated as follows: D. H. Clark, at $6,000 per year; M. R. Muzzy, at from six to eight thousand dollars per year; Sylvester Kelley, at from six to eight thousand dollars per year; T. S. Tennis, at $10,000 per year.

"Colonel Thomas G. Whytall, depot quartermaster in charge, says the farm was of incalculable value and importance to the Government.

"Sylvester Kelley, William Outten, R. Whiting, Robert B. Wood, J. S. Moody, and Z. Craver say the farm was of indispensable value to the Government.

"Herman Briggs says the farm was indispensably necessary to the quartermaster's department, and would have been very profitable to the owner, and his allowance for use and occupation should be liberal.

"General Roberts, General Hays, Captain Adams, Colonel Baylor, Captain Sanger, and Colonel Curry say that the farm was indispensable to the military operations of the Government. There is much other testimony to the same effect."

I do not know whether Senators desire me to read the whole recapitulation of this evidence, some of which is much stronger to that point than that which I have read; but I will proceed:

"On this testimony, and from personal inspection of the premises, the board fix the monthly value of the use and occupation of said farm at $400, making $4,800 per year, subject to some small credits which Mr. Segar had received for rent of parts of the said premises, and also subject to a proper deduction for his own use and occupation of the dwelling-house after it was restored to him.

"Mr. Segar acknowledges that he has received full compensation for use and occupation of his farm from and after April 2, 1866."

The Government occupied the farm from the 24th of May, 1861, to January 1, 1867, according to the certificate of the quartermaster:

"From 25th November, 1865, (the time to which the military commission assessed the value,) to said 2d April, 1866, would be four months and eight days, which, at $366 77 per month, would make the sum of, say, $1,565."

"But the claimant acknowledges having received from Freedmen's Bureau, after the closing of the military survey hereinbefore set forth, and to be applied as a credit for use and occupation prior to 2d April, 1866, the sum of $3,766 07."

The military board referred to consisted of the following-named officers: Charles P. Baldwin, lieutenant colonel eleventh Maine infantry, president; Thomas F. Edwards, major twenty-fourth Massachusetts infantry; and George C. Scammon, captain eleventh Maine infantry, recorder.

I have given a recapitulation of the damages to the farm, but inasmuch as the committee allow no damages to the farm I will omit that. They only allow for the value of the timber:

"In reference to the timber destroyed:

"Six witnesses, to wit: Kelley, Outten, Whiting, Wood, Moody, and Craver, say woodland of nearly one hundred acres entirely stripped.

"Six other witnesses, to wit: General Roberts, General Hays, Captain Adams, Colonel Baylor, Captain Sanger, and Colonel Curry, say fencing, fuel, and timber, all destroyed.

"C. W. Hickman and J. C. Phillips say value of wood per cord on the stump in the woods was at the least from two and a half to three dollars per cord. The latter says he knows that the Freedmen's Bureau actually paid six dollars per cord for wood in the immediate vicinity. They also fix the area of the woodland at about one hundred acres, and estimate that each acre would have produced at least seventy-five cords. But the title of Mr. Segar to a part of this woodland seems to have been in dispute. Surveyor Joy, by actual survey, fixes the area belonging to Mr. Segar, clear of dispute, at seventy-seven and a quarter acres.

"Fixing the amount of wood at seventy-five cords per acre, (the lowest estimate of any of the witnesses,) the total number of cords on the seventy-seven and a quarter acres would be five thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, which, at three dollars per cord, would make the sum of $17,382; but this is subject (see General Howard's letter) to a credit of $1,828 17, leaving balance of $15,553 83.

"The result, therefore, of the evidence as aforesaid, is as follows:

Balance due on quartermaster stores and commissary subsistence.....	$1,560 00
Use and occupancy of the farm to 25th November, 1865, as ascertained by military commission, which see.....	$20,410 10
Use and occupancy of the farm from 25th November, 1865, to 2d April, 1866.....	1,565 00
	21,975 10
Subject to credit of.....	3,766 07
Leaving balance of.....	18,209 03
Timber cut and used for fuel.....	$17,382 00
Subject to credit of.....	1,828 17

Leaving balance.....	15,553 83
	$35,322 86

It is proved that every panel of the fence of the farm was destroyed; and since this report I have received a certificate from the quartermaster that for want of fuel it was burned as fuel. There is evidence that it would take $1,000 a mile to restore that fence, but estimating that fence at half what a new fence would be worth it would amount to $3,000, at least. This estimate also excludes any destruction of the farm-house, worth probably $3,000; but putting that at half the amount, $1,500, here would be an additional sum of $4,500, for which no allowance is made.

"Nor is any estimate made for the damage done by digging trenches, constructing roads through it, &c., creating pools of stagnant water, and causing a formerly healthy location to be unhealthy."

So unhealthy that although formerly one of the most healthy places in the country, Mr. Segar has now taken his family away in consequence of the intermittent fever. It is impossible for them to live there, himself being sick and his family penniless, beggars, by what has been taken from them, and now depending upon the charity of their friends; while men are at his door waiting for the suspension of the stay law in Virginia, formerly his enemies and now his persecutors, ready to foreclose the mortgage and take even the soil that is left from him. We say further in this report:

"The destruction of fences and buildings was evidently the result of private trespasses and depredations by the soldiers and freedmen; and although the losses occasioned thereby are as great to the claimant as if they had been lawfully authorized by the Army the committee did not feel at liberty to allow claims of that character."

Since that time we have received evidence that they were taken and burned for fuel by the quartermaster.

"After maturely considering this case, and taking also into consideration the abatements to which ex parte testimony must always be subject, the committee are satisfied that the claimant is still entitled, at the lowest estimate which can be reasonably made, to the sum of $25,000, by reason of the matters as set forth in his petition and accompanying papers. The committee therefore report the accompanying bill, providing for the payment of that sum."

I have an extract from the report of the military commission which I could read, or I can read any amount of evidence to substantiate these facts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia what this land was worth as a farm before it was taken possession of according to the rates of value in that neighborhood and considering the character of this property? What was it worth per acre as it was improved then?

Mr. WILLEY. The evidence is contradictory on that point. It varied from one to one hundred and fifty dollars per acre. Allow me to state another fact in connection with it. Colonel Segar, by permission of the United States Government, erected what is called the Hygeia Hotel on the public grounds near Fortress Monroe, with the explicit understanding that in any military exigency it must be taken down if the military authorities required; and although he and his partner had invested in that hotel $90,000 it was taken down, and it is a total loss to him, because he has no claim on the Government for it. If there ever was a man on the face of God's earth entitled to this pittance at the hands of Congress it is Joseph Segar, a loyal, honorable man; and this bill does not give him one half what he is honestly entitled to at the hands of the Government.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the sum named in this bill is very much too large. This man had four hundred acres of land, and the out-houses upon his farm were not destroyed at all.

Mr. WILLEY. All the out-houses were destroyed except one.

Mr. CAMERON. I beg the Senator's pardon, I know something about it. The Senator is mistaken as to the Hygeia Hotel. Instead of being injured by that transaction he was a great beneficiary. He occupied that property for years without paying the Government one dollar of rent, and he got a large income from it every year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Who built that?

Mr. CAMERON. He built it himself on the Government's land, on ground belonging to the Government. That was taken from him during the war. I know something about the occupation of lands by the troops. They occupied my land at Harrisburg for six or eight or ten months; they destroyed my timber, burnt down my fences, and injured my crops; and I never got a dollar. I had a little contest with them on one point, about the time they were going away, because they wanted to sell the manure which the horses had left on the ground, [laughter,] and I would not agree to it. I have no doubt that on this man's farm, if two hundred acres of the land were occupied by the Army, they must have had eight or ten thousand horses there during the time; and I have no doubt it is worth twice or thrice as much as it was before the troops took possession.

Mr. CONNESS. That is your experience.

Mr. CAMERON. Yes, sir. The whole country around here has been benefited by the manure left by the Army. The crops are a great deal better than they were before; more abundant, and in every way better. I move to amend the bill by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$10,000," which I think is a very liberal sum.

Mr. HOWE. Let me say one word. The subject-matter of this claim has been stated by the Senator from West Virginia. It is impossible for the whole Senate to go into the evidence by which this claim is supported and form an accurate judgment as to the precise sum that should be recovered. I can only say to the Senate that the committee considered it very carefully. We hesitated a time as to whether we should report any sum or report a bill sending him to the Court of Claims to have the damages assessed there; but upon full consideration it was finally the unanimous opinion of the committee—and the composition of the committee is known to the Senate—that it was safer for the Government to pay this sum rather than to let it go to the Court of Claims. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and others belonging to the committee will attest that. I shall not argue a moment as to whether the sum should be $10,000 or $25,000. The bill expresses the judgment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, to reduce the sum to $10,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, in my county there was a case of the occupation of land, a farm, for a considerable time by a camp. The troops destroyed the fences, swept off the crops, cut down the sugar corn, cut down the trees, and committed depredations generally. There was an investigation afterward, and a report was made that the drippings of the camp were sufficient to indemnify that gentleman, and he has gone without a copper of compensation to this day. So that gentleman need not smile at the statement which my colleague has made in reference to the occupation of lands by troops. That seems to answer up in Pennsylvania; at least it answered in my county in a case within my own knowledge.

Mr. President, this mode of assessing damages to individuals for the occupancy of their lands, for the destruction of their property, and for supplies obtained by the Army from them, is the most dangerous system we can undertake in reference to these demands—an investigation upon ex parte statement here before committees. It is impossible for us to base an honest and intelligent vote upon cases examined in this manner and presented to us hurriedly in the closing hours of the session. Why, just think of it! This demand of $25,000 is about sixty dollars an acre for the whole of this farm, including the improved parts and the woodland, and I believe the highest estimate of its value is one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and fifty dollars an acre. It seems the house was restored and some of the other buildings, and that at least the house was put in good condition; that there was an allowance made to him of some six thousand dollars actual payment for all the articles that were used when possession was taken of the premises, carts and wagons, and some of the crops, and so on; so that the mere naked occupation of the land afterward is to be paid for at the enormous rate of sixty dollars an acre. Now, sir, I venture to say that if this property was put under the hammer at this moment it would not bring the amount that it is here proposed to vote to this man for the occupation of it for two or three years. This is not payment for damages done to the property when possession was taken of it. Payment was then made to the extent of $6,000. It is for the use and occupancy of the land afterward. The main destruction must have been of the fences, and some of the timber was consumed; but about the timber, it does not appear that all of it was consumed, because after the Freedmen's Bureau took possession of it they took off a portion of the timber, which has been paid for.

Mr. WILLEY. The Senator seems to be under a misapprehension. This amount paid when they went there was not for use and occupation, but it was for corn in the crib, for wagons, for tools, for horses, for mules. The amount was estimated by a military commission for property taken at the very time they commenced the use and occupation of the land.

Mr. BUCKALEW. That is the very thing I say, that this allowance is for use and occupation of the land afterward. It is not for the articles upon the premises which were taken possession of by the Army. They were paid for, or nearly paid for, within $1,600. It is for the mere use of the land except so far as timber was cut from that portion which was woodland. It seems to me that on the very face of it this is a most monstrous demand, paying this man at the rate of sixty dollars an acre, probably more than the whole value of the land at this time, in the way of damages. And observe this is done upon an ex parte examination. Nobody has represented the Government in this investigation; no solicitor of the Court of Claims has been notified of the taking of the evidence; there was no cross-examination in behalf of the Government. Nor does this whole claim rest upon the report of the military commission. A part of it is made up of a sum assessed here in a private committee-room, upon papers presented by the claimant himself, without any cross-examination of the witnesses, without the Government being represented. Well, sir, no committee can be made in either House of Congress so intelligent, so honorable, so sagacious, that can investigate claims presented here in this manner and do justice to the Government. It is utterly impossible; and it is because it is impossible that we have constituted a Court of Claims and have conferred upon that court enlarged powers, have provided officers to represent the Government, and pay annually out of the Treasury a large sum of money to see that such claims as this are duly investigated, and that justice is done to the Government as well as to claimants.

I do not object so much to the appropriation of $25,000 out of the Treasury upon this claim, insufficiently as it seems to me to be established and shown here; I object to the system. If you vote to Mr. Segar upon the estimate of one of our committees this large sum of money, sixty dollars an acre for the whole of his farm, from all parts of Virginia, and from all parts of the South and from the central States, claims will come up here by the hundred, and they will demand as an act of justice that we shall vote the money, and you cannot say no. They will plead this very case that you are passing to-night upon the report of a committee merely, as a conclusive precedent in behalf of the allowance demanded.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not take the view of this case which is taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW.] This land appears, at the commencement of the war, to have been worth from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars an acre. Assuming it to have been worth $125 an acre, the plantation was worth above fifty-five thousand dollars; a handsome estate. That man is turned off. It is taken possession of by the Government. It is held for five or six years. Now, I ask Senators what that is worth, not upon ex parte statement, as the Senator from Pennsylvania seems to think, but upon the testimony of officers of the Government. What is it worth? The rental value for the five or six years, these officers say, is worth above twenty thousand dollars. That is the evidence, not ex parte, but of the Government's own officers. A commission appointed by the Government made an estimate of the use of this property for the time this man was turned off, and put it at $21,000. Now, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON,] who spoke of the depredations upon his own plantation, what is the present difference between the value of this estate down near Fortress Monroe and its value before it was taken by the Government; a beautiful farm with fences, with one hundred acres of woodland, with three hundred and forty-seven acres of improved land well fenced, in good condition, making a good return to the owner? What is the difference between the value then and now? It was worth $125 an acre when taken possession of. What is it worth now? I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCKALEW,] that perhaps it is not worth $25,000 now. According to the description of that plantation to-day, because of the depredation upon it, the destruction of the fences, the destruction of the timber, the destruction of the soil, making it into roads, and other uses by the military forces there for four or five years, I would not give for it now one half what it was worth when it was taken possession of, and I undertake to guess that the Senator from Pennsylvania would not. It is worth as it comes back to the owner to-day with the mortgages upon it, less by one half than it was when it was taken possession of. Therefore the payment of rent is not sufficient. If you rent your house and let to your neighbor at $100 a month, that is compensation to you; but you expect it to be returned in as good condition as he took it, except the necessary and natural decay of the property. That is not the case here. This property is to be paid for, the loss of the property, not the destruction of the improvements, but the use of the property for five or six years.

Is it to be said to the Senate of the United States that if we allow a claim which is just and honest other claims may come, that we are to reject a claim that is right because somebody else may present a claim? I have never yet listened to that argument. The Government of the United States must pay its honest debts, even if other creditors should present themselves.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator misconceives my argument. It was not that we should refuse to pay the claim, but that we should turn it over to a proper tribunal.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The proper tribunal cannot do full justice in this case. The Court of Claims as organized cannot; and I believe this case has been before that court; has it not?

Mr. WILLEY. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought it had been; but for the loss of this property a compensation cannot be made by the Court of Claims. What has the Court of Claims to do with the cutting down of a grove of one hundred acres of woodland? Does that come within any of the definitions of the jurisdiction of that court? Does that rest upon contract? Does that rest upon law? Does that rest upon departmental regulations and orders? No, sir; it does not come within the jurisdiction of that court as now defined by law. It is simply a case of power exercised to take that which belongs to the citizen for the public good. It does not rest upon contract, nor law, nor departmental regulations.

Returning to the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, if there are other cases like this we ought to hear them. If the Government of the United States has gone upon the farm of the Senator's neighbor and has occupied that farm and driven his family away so that that family has not been any longer supported upon that farm, and the Government has had the use of that private property, shall the Government not pay for it? Can it be claimed that the Government of the United States can occupy property and not pay for it? Can it be claimed that the Government can take one hundred acres of woodland and convert that into fuel for the use of the Army, and yet not pay for it? It is just, it is right that this man should be paid. It is right because his property has been taken, it has been used, it has been destroyed; and it seems to me, according to this report, that the estimate made by the committee is a very low one. The use of the property, according to the report of the commission on that subject, nearly amounts to the twenty-five thousand dollars; and does any Senator who knows anything of the value of a handsome farm undertake to say that the injury to this plantation is not a very serious one, one that cannot be repaired short of a very large expenditure? I do not believe that farm to-day is worth one half what it was when the Government took it; and the money due for the use of it for these intervening years must be paid by the Government as an honest debt, just such a debt as the Senator from Pennsylvania would have to pay for in a court if he had taken the use of the property. For the use of it I have no doubt the Court of Claims can give a judgment; but for the balance of this claim that court has no jurisdiction.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana a question. Shall I understand him to say that the Court of Claims has no jurisdiction of a claim for the occupation of land for military purposes and the destruction of timber?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I undertake to say—I do not know just how the Senator understood me—that for the use and occupation I presume the court would have jurisdiction upon the common count, resting it upon contract, an assumed or implied contract to pay for the use and occupation; but for the destruction of property, which is in the nature of trespass, it does not rest upon contract.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator does mean, then, that I shall understand him in that way. I beg to take issue with him. I affirm not only that the Court of Claims would have jurisdiction to try such a case as that, but that the court has tried such cases, and has adjudicated upon them—upon cases which arose anterior to this war. I refer particularly to a case which the Senator from Oregon may remember, a case which arose in his State, the case of Johnson, I think, against the United States for the occupation of land near the Cascades on the Columbia river, the erection of two block-houses, the cutting down of timber; and in short the parallel of this case, which was tried in the Court of Claims, and in which a recovery was had of $40,000.

I do not rise to contest this claim; but I think the Senator will have to revise the opinion he has given, that the Court of Claims is not the appropriate jurisdiction to extend over this case. Certainly, it seems to me, that they could find, upon the theory of an implied assumpsit, what would be the fair rent for these premises as they were occupied, and the fair recompense for the injury inflicted on the Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will ask the Senator a question with his permission. In a case of trespass upon land, cutting of timber, can the trespass be waived by the party and he sue in contract for the damage thus done? It is very plain that where personal property is taken and used the party may waive the trespass and sue on contract; but for a trespass to real estate, a cutting of timber without the authority of the owner, can you sue for that wrong in contract? Does it rest upon contract?

Mr. CONKLING. I rather think from the tone and degree in which the Senator suggests that question that he and I would be at issue as to the true answer to it in the abstract. Without being diverted, however, to the consideration of that question, I dispose of it practically as far as it is here by saying to the Senator that if the United States through any of its authorized agents takes possession of my property, real property though it be, occupies it in a manner no matter how peculiar, inflicting injury upon it, transforming it in its character from woodland to meadowland, or in any other way the Senator pleases, as I understand the law, I may go and I ought to go into the Court of Claims and recover upon the special facts of the case, whether he would denominate it a special action on the case or an action of assumpsit. I recover upon my petition setting out these facts, and the Court of Claims would carve out of the facts just such a decree as would be appropriate. I understand that the Court of Claims would have power to do that just as undoubtedly as a court of equity would have that power. If that is not so, then I cannot comprehend how the claimant in the case of Johnson, that I referred to, maintained his cause of action for just such an occupation as we are talking about.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York—

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to read a section of law which, I think, will satisfy both the Senator from New York and himself what the law is. It is very brief:

"That the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or appropriation of ordnance to property by the Army or Navy or any part of the Army or Navy engaged in the suppression of the rebellion from the commencement to the close thereof."

Mr. CONKLING. Does that section apply to all States alike?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it does apply to all States alike.

Mr. CONKLING. My recollection was, though I do not dispute the Senator's statement, that that section applied to those States and that portion of territory declared in insurrection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There is no such limitation.

Mr. CONKLING. But then certain territory was excepted by proclamation. If that statute has stepped in, and there be no statutory answer, I admit the Senator is right; but I still contest with the Senator from Indiana the point on the principle he laid down; and I affirm that but for the special statute cutting it off there would be no doubt whatever of the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and that was the question which the Senator from Indiana and I were discussing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think there is a question involved in this case of more importance than that suggested by the Senator from Indiana or discussed by the Senator from New York. I am impressed with the hardship of the case as it has been presented by the Senator from West Virginia; but the inquiry arises in my mind as to whether or not this was not one of the calamities of war. Eleven States, of which Virginia was one, organized into a confederacy and made war upon the Government. To subdue the rebellion which they made the Government organized armies and sent them into those States, and it was a necessary part of the duty of those armies to destroy property, to kill men, and in every lawful way, according to the rules of war, to cripple the enemies of the country. Senators seem to regard this claim with indifference; but it follows necessarily that if this claim is allowed by Congress every man in these eleven States upon whose lands the Union Army made a camp, whose house was taken for the purposes of war, whose fences were destroyed in the progress of the war, whose timber was destroyed by reason of the war, will have a claim against the Government; and we shall be engaged for the next ten, fifteen, or twenty years in imposing taxes upon the people of this country to indemnify those who lived in the rebel States for the losses which they sustained during the war.

This opens the door; this is the fatal precedent that will plead for every case that may arise in the eleven rebel States for property that was taken or that was destroyed or injured by the prosecution of the war in putting down this rebellion, and you cannot distinguish between one claim and another upon principle. It was necessary, if we sent our armies into those States, that they should make camps; and was it possible for the armies to distinguish between the innocent and the guilty? Is it not one of the inevitable consequences of war that where an army invades a country the innocent must suffer with the guilty? That is a great calamity, but it is unavoidable.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend is laboring under a misapprehension. This land was all within our lines, and not within the rebel lines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Was it not in the State of Virginia?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not within the rebel lines. It was expressly excepted by proclamation. It was the same thing as if it had been land in Oregon.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Oregon is entirely mistaken as to the fact. This was as clearly outside of the rebellion as Massachusetts was, clearly defined by the proclamation. We must be allowed to know about that, because we have examined the testimony.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is allowed to know. I do not dispute what the Senator knows. I say it was in the State of Virginia.

Mr. HOWE. That is true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And Virginia was one of the States which were in rebellion against the Government. If there are some particular facts which except this case from the general rule, those, of course, are to be considered by the Senate; but I call attention to this claim and to claims of this description; I know there are many of them pending before Congress. They are creeping along. One comes with some special circumstances that are supposed to take it out of the general rule; and another comes with some other circumstances that describe it and except it from the general rule; and in that way these claims are coming up like clouds against the Government and will be allowed unless Congress takes some decided stand upon that subject and establishes some uniform rule to which it will adhere. I know that one or two claims have passed Congress that originated in the rebel States, within the lines of the rebel armies, for the destruction of property; and this case seems to me to be one very much like them, although it is said that this particular land was within the Federal lines.

Mr. WILLEY. There can be no question of that fact. This was taken possession of on the 24th day of May, 1861. There had been no war yet. This soil never was for one moment within the lines of the enemy. It is under the guns of Fortress Monroe almost. This was taken possession of on the 24th of May, 1861, and never was out of the possession of the Government until the 1st day of January, 1867.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that to be the statement that was made, that it was within the Federal lines; but the question is as to whether the rule fixing the legality of these claims is to be determined by the State in which the claim originates, or whether it is to be governed by the lines that varied from time to time as the war progressed?

I have stated my objection to this claim as I have to other kindred claims of this description. I presume that the objection will be overruled as it has been heretofore overruled in one or two cases of this description; but I desire, so far as I am concerned, to say that in my judgment the loyal people of this country ought not, after they have expended thousands of millions of dollars to put down this rebellion, and sacrificed hundreds of thousands of lives, to be now taxed year after year for an indefinite time to indemnify the people of the rebel States for the losses which they sustained during the war.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. President, I had supposed that the object of government was to protect citizens in their rights of property. If it does not have that object, I do not know what it has. I do assure you, sir, that the loyal people in the southern States expect the Government of the United States to indemnify them for property that they lost and that they gave for the support of the Army and Navy during the war. The Government of the United States, in my opinion, is bound to discharge this solemn duty to those people. It was its duty to protect them against violence of all kinds, and having failed to do that, it is its duty to indemnify them for the losses of property and the property the Government took to support its armies and its navies. If, however, it is to be the determination of what is called the loyal States in contradistinction to what it has pleased some individuals to call the rebel States to say that the loyal men of the rebel States shall never receive any compensation for the supplies that they furnished the Army and Navy, we wish that to be distinctly understood. There are certain other obligations that are devolved on the American people by persons in the loyal States. There is a large debt, and it is mostly in bonds. The bondholders will expect, of course, the men of the rebel States to pay their portion of taxes in order to pay this debt faithfully, and we expect to do it; but if the obligations of the Government with respect to the loyal men of the South are to be refused in this kind of style we shall see what other contracts are valid besides.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I offer the following amendment as a substitute for the bill:

That the claims of Joseph Segar, of Virginia, for use and occupation of his lands, and for timber appropriated therefrom by the military forces of the United States during the recent war, are hereby referred to the Court of Claims for investigation and allowance, the amount allowed not to exceed $25,000, in addition to the sums heretofore paid on said claims.

Congress two or three years ago, by a general law, withheld the adjudication of these cases from that court. What I propose is simply this: that in the present case, as upon the prima facie showing, here is a meritorious claim, according to the report of our committee, we shall send the claim to that court to be determined upon the general law as it stood before the statute of 1864 was passed.

Mr. HARLAN. Is it not in order to amend the matter of the bill before the question is taken on striking out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$15,000." I think the committee have got it a little too high. I observe the testimony stated by the Senator from West Virginia was that the use of the land was supposed to be worth from six to eight thousand dollars a year. There are said to be about three hundred acres, I think, of tillable land. In my country you can rent land at from two to three dollars an acre. Suppose it is worth double that in Virginia, and I think it is no more than double, six dollars an acre would make $1,800 a year, very much below the sum placed by some of the witnesses that have testified in the case. I think they have overestimated the value of the rental of the land; and I judge from all the testimony, although of course I have not had an opportunity to form as correct an opinion as the committee have had, that this owner will be probably satisfied with $15,000 rather than go to the Court of Claims. It would drag along there several years probably, and he would have to pay attorneys' fees and lie out of the use of his money. I think it better to fix on some sum that a majority of the Senate will vote for. I therefore move to amend the bill by striking out $25,000 and inserting $15,000.

Mr. DRAKE. Mr. President, if it is proper for the Senate to pass upon a sum at all, it seems to me that great weight ought to be attached to the opinion of such a committee as the Committee on Claims of this body. I do not think it is right to treat a loyal man whose property has been used by the Government in any such way as that. I think we ought to be prepared to do justice here in every such case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to amend the bill by inserting "$20,000" in place of "$25,000."

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCKALEW. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. Let me say one word. The Senator from Pennsylvania is a just man. I think he must concede that it is not fair after this man had a trial before one tribunal, whatever may be said of the character of that tribunal, to send him to another tribunal and to limit his recovery. Send him to the Court of Claims and strike off the limit from his right of recovery, and all I can say is that he will recover a heavier judgment than there is here.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There has never been any trial of this case at all; there was an appointment of a military commission, who went there and made an ex parte examination on the subject and made a report; but that is only a part of the demand. A portion of this claim was never investigated by any authority except the committee.

Mr. TIPTON. I wish only to say that every man who knows anything about the Army will admit that there were certain incidental damages done wherever the Army marched that never can be paid for and never ought to be asked for. I think much of that kind of incidental damage enters into this claim; and this Government would be bankrupt for a thousand years if it would undertake to pay all the claims that would follow in the wake of such a claim as this.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have asked for the yeas and nays in order to put my protest upon the record on the first important one of these bills, to show that I resisted the establishment of this system which will lead to the presentation of a large number of claims to us at the next session. I beg to suggest to the Senate that it is utterly impossible that Congress in this case can do anything like justice to the Government and the claimant. That will depend on the passions and feelings of the hour in a numerous body like this, on sympathy for the claimant, on an impassioned appeal, on the state of a man's nerves, whether the Senate is tired or fresh. We cannot investigate and pass upon cases of this kind. I implore the Senate to turn this case over to the Court of Claims, to have a rule. If we do not do this, that statute of 1864 will be one of the most pernicious ones ever put upon our statute-book, so far as the pecuniary interests of the Government are concerned. Far better would it have been to have left the whole of these claims to the proper court without the interference of Congress to protect the Government against them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I concur in what the Senator from Pennsylvania has said as to the Court of Claims being altogether the better tribunal to investigate cases of this kind. I believe there is no tribunal ever devised so well calculated to illustrate the truth and arrive at a judgment upon facts as a court where witnesses are examined and cross-examined, brought face to face with the parties on both sides; and I think one of the most miserable ways of investigating any case depending on facts is to do it on ex parte affidavits. But I submit to the Senator from Pennsylvania, is it competent by a resolution of the Senate to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction of this case? We have a law passed in 1866 expressly prohibiting the court from taking jurisdiction of such cases. When we have referred it there, would this resolution repeal the law?

Mr. CONKLING. Is not this a joint resolution?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; it does not purport to be. If it be a joint resolution or an act, then I grant you it will be sufficient.

Mr. CONKLING. Is it not to be?

Mr. BUCKALEW. As a matter of course I understood this to be a joint resolution, which, if passed, would have the force of law; otherwise it would not carry the money to the claimant.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The law formerly was that the Court of Claims could take jurisdiction of causes of action arising out of contracts, expressed or implied, and also of such cases as might be referred to it by either House of Congress; but in 1866 Congress intervened and said the court should have no jurisdiction of cases of this character, and it seems to me that a resolution, unless it should be a joint resolution having the force of a law, would not confer jurisdiction.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to have the resolution read. If it is not a joint resolution or a law it is of no account.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter before the Senate is Senate bill No. 575, for the relief of Joseph Segar.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But this amendment reads "Resolved." So it is at the desk.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I did not offer anything except the substance of the amendment. The formal introduction is to be left as it is in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the amendment is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert what has been read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That makes a law.

Mr. WILLEY. If this amendment should be adopted, will it be subject to amendment afterward?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill shall have been reported to the Senate it will be subject to amendment.

Mr. WILLEY. I move now to strike out so much of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania as limits the allowance to $25,000. If the case is to go to the Court of Claims, let him have what he can show himself entitled to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved to amend the amendment by striking out the limitation of $25,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler,

Conkling, Conness, Cragin, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, McCreery, Morgan, Nye, Patterson of New Hampshire, Rice, Ross, Sawyer, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Trumbull, and Williams—24.

YAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Anthony, Cattell, Corbett, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Pomeroy, Thayer, Vickers, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Cole, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Kellogg, McDonald, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norton, Pool, Ramsey, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Van Winkle, Welch, Whyte, and Yates—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended to read: "A bill to refer the claim of Joseph Segar to the Court of Claims."

O. N. CUTLER.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 591.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 591) for the relief of O. N. Cutler was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to O. N. Cutler $50,000, in full compensation for two hundred and sixty-eight bales of cotton seized by order of General Ulysses S. Grant at Lake Providence, Louisiana, the property of Cutler, and used for military purposes in equipping the steamer Tigress for running the blockade of the Mississippi river, at Vicksburg, in the month of April, 1863, and destroyed.

Mr. HOWE. That is a large claim, and I will state in a very few words what the facts are about it. In 1863, under the direction of General McPherson, commanding at Vicksburg, his chief quartermaster made a contract with a man by the name of Wagley to pick cotton out in the neighborhood of Lake Providence. He was to hire the help, pay them, feed them, pick the cotton, bale it, and have half of it, and turn the other half over to the Army for the use of the Government. Wagley assigned the contract to Cutler. Cutler went on and picked a large amount of cotton, baled it, delivered half of it to the Government, and the other half was at Lake Providence. When General Grant wanted to run the batteries at Vicksburg he sent out some steamers to gather up all the cotton they could to protect his boats. Although in the contract for picking the officer had stipulated against this cotton being seized it was seized, brought down, and used in packing the machinery of the Tigress, and was sunk with the Tigress by the rebel batteries in running by Vicksburg. The number of bales is proved by the officers who took it and used it on the boat. The value of the cotton is proved by the sales by the Government at Memphis. The cost of transportation is proved by the quartermasters on duty. Everything is proved except the weight of the bales. That is not proved except by the testimony of the petitioner himself, and we have cut down his estimate of the weight considerably. According to his estimate of the weight his claim would be sixty-two thousand and some odd dollars. We have reported an even $50,000. These are just the facts in the case.

Mr. MORGAN. If there was good reason for referring the other case to the Court of Claims I should think there was good reason for referring this. It is a much larger claim. I make the motion that this be referred to the Court of Claims. I move the same amendment that was made in the other case.

Mr. STEWART. I think this bill had better go over to the next session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that in the present condition of business we ought not to consider such a bill as this, but should attend to the transaction of the large amount of business requiring attention in executive session.

Mr. SUMNER. I was about to submit a motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOWE. Let us take the vote on this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin asked two hours, and he has had them. I feel very restive when we are passing on claims of fifty or sixty thousand dollars of this character.

Mr. HOWE. I have had but fifteen minutes really.

Mr. SHERMAN. I feel very restive in passing claims for fifty or sixty thousand dollars growing out of losses during the war, when the policy of our laws forbids their being considered by the Court of Claims. I agree to what has been said by the Senator from Illinois, that these claims ought to be sent to some tribunal where they can be thoroughly examined.

Mr. HOWE. Very well, I only want to get the sense of the Senate. I wish to say to the Senator from Ohio that he can have no conception of the relief which has been afforded to the Committee on Claims by the vote which has been taken in the case of Mr. Segar. If the Senator will move to this bill the amendment which the Senator from Pennsylvania moved in that case he can test the sense of the Senate on that point.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me point out a danger. It was with a great deal of reluctance that I voted for the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Once break down the rule you have established and agree to pay for losses, depredations, damages, &c., caused by the war on private property, or for a man's cotton taken and used for the public service and sunk in the river, and where will you stop? The difficulty is in ascertaining precisely what classes of claims we ought to pay and what we ought not to pay. That question ought to be settled at some time or other by a court under certain established general rules. I do not think we ought to make precedents now which will be dangerous hereafter. It was with great doubt that I voted to refer Segar's claim to the Court of Claims, and hereafter when a strong case is made appealing to our sympathies in behalf of a man who is semi-loyal or entirely loyal, as that claimant undoubtedly is, we shall be pressed to refer it to the Court of Claims, conferring on that court jurisdiction, and thus we shall open wide a door for claims that may amount to $1,000,000,000. Indeed, one of my colleagues in the House of Representatives, in a very elaborate report, estimated the claims growing out of the war caused by depredations to property, destruction of property, and injury to property, as amounting to some $1,500,000,000.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, let me state to the Senator from Ohio the predicament he puts the Committee on Claims in. We have this army of claimants on us, and we cannot turn them out of the committee-room, and you will not turn them out of the Senate; you will send their claims to us. You have precluded them by a general law from going to the Court of Claims, and you will not alter it. You have altered it in the other case, and individually I thank you for it, and I think the Committee on Claims are very grateful to you, but you do not propose to alter it here. You say they shall not go to the Court of Claims; you send them to us; you make us examine the claims and report them here, and you will not vote on them. I only ask you to vote. Establish some rule and I will abide by it.

Mr. SHERMAN. This cotton, I admit, according to the statement made, was cotton belonging to this man which was taken for public use. A claim is presented which in equity everybody will admit ought to be responded to. But is his claim in equity any stronger than the claim of a loyal owner of real estate in a rebel State whose land was entered upon, whose fields were dug up and trenched, out of whose homestead a battery was made or a block-house? May not thousands and tens of thousands of such cases arise? We could not undertake to pay those damages.

Mr. HOWE. I will not undertake to say that the equity here is stronger than it is in the other case suggested. I only ask the Senate to decide something, not to send these hordes of claims to the committee to labor on them, report on them, and then say you will not consider them. Just tell us what the law is and we will abide by it; but to hang these fellows up between heaven and earth, and make the Committee on Claims nurse them and poultice them there, is not right. I do not like the duty.

Mr. SUMNER. I renew my motion.

Mr. STEWART. I think this bill ought to be postponed until the December session, and then we can discuss the matter and settle some rule. I do not believe we can at this time arrive at any safe conclusion as to what to do with this class of cases.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree with the Senator to-night, and therefore I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that if the Senator from Wisconsin has any undisputed claims he be allowed to have them passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. HOWE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Buckalew, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Conkling, Corbett, Doolittle, Ferry, Fessenden, Harlan, Harris, Howard, McCreery, Morgan, Patterson of New Hampshire, Pomeroy, Rice, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Tipton, Vickers, and Welch—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cragin, Drake, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Nye, Osborn, Patterson of Tennessee, Ramsey, Thayer, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Edmunds, Grimes, Hendricks, Kellogg, McDonald, Morton, Norton, Pool, Robertson, Ross, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, Whyte, and Yates—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

After some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned until ten o'clock to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 24, 1868.

The SPEAKER. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the session of Friday commences. The Journal of yesterday not having been completed if there is no objection the reading of it will be dispensed with.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the motion made yesterday by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURNE,] to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution in regard to the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was put; and there were—yeas 63, noes 48.

Mr. MAYNARD and Mr. PAINE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Would it be in order to move to postpone the consideration of this question until Saturday at two o'clock?

The SPEAKER. It would not. The motion to lay on the table has priority of the motion to postpone.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I appeal to my colleague to let this matter lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order.

Mr. ORTH. We can rescind the resolution if necessary.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, we cannot.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 71, not voting 70; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Axtell, Baker, Baldwin, Beck, Blair, Boyden, Broomall, Roderick

R. Butler, Cake, Cary, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Dixon, Dockery, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferriss, Getz, Glossbrenner, Golladay, Grover, Haight, Halsey, Hill, Hotchkiss, Hunter, Johnson, Thomas L. Jones, Judd, Kerr, Ketchum, Knott, Koontz, Ladin, Lash, Mallory, McCullough, McKee, Mercer, Moore, Mungen, Niblack, Orth, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Poland, Pomeroy, Robertson, Ross, Sawyer, Seofield, Sitgreaves, Smith, Starkweather, Aaron F. Stevens, Stewart, Taber, Lawrence S. Trimble, Trowbridge, Twichell, Van Arnam, Burt Van Horn, Van Trump, Van Wyck, Ellihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—75.

YAYS—Messrs. Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Bailey, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Bromwell, Buckland, Buckley, Benjamin F. Butler, Cullis, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Covode, De-weese, Driggs, Ela, Farnsworth, Fields, French, Garfield, Goss, Gravelly, Hamilton, Haughey, Hawkins, Heaton, Higby, Hinds, Hooper, Hopkins, Ingersoll, Jencks, Alexander H. Jones, Kelley, William Lawrence, Loan, Logan, Loughridge, Maynard, McClurg, Miller, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Paine, Pile, Plants, Polsey, Schenck, Stokes, Sypher, Taffe, Taylor, Thomas, John Trimble, Vidal, Ward, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whittemore, and William Williams—71.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Blaine, Boyer, Brooks, Burr, Chanler, Cook, Cornell, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Griswold, Harding, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulbard, Humphrey, Julian, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kitchen, George V. Lawrence, Lincoln, Lynch, Mann, Marshall, Marvin, McCarthy, McCormick, Moorhead, Morrell, Morrissey, Newcomb, Newsham, Nicholson, Norris, Peters, Pierce, Price, Pruyn, Randall, Raum, Robinson, Root, Selye, Shanks, Shellabarger, Spalding, Thaddeus Stevens, Stone, Upson, Van Auken, Robert T. Van Horn, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward—70.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

During the roll-call, Mr. RAUM stated that he was paired on this question with Mr. MARSHALL, or he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. ALLISON stated that he had paired with Mr. Brooks on this question, or he would have voted no.

Mr. KELSEY stated that he was paired on this question with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am opposed to the recess, but for the sake of getting this House away from here I vote ay.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to make a report from a committee of conference.

ILLINOIS IRON AND BOLT COMPANY.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask leave to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill for the relief of the Illinois Iron and Bolt Company. It will take but a single moment, and is of some importance.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I object.

LAND SCRIP IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. WHITTEMORE.]

Mr. WHITTEMORE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 856) relative to land scrip in the State of South Carolina; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

REPRESENTATIVES FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. DAWES presented the credentials of Samuel F. Gove, of the fourth congressional district, and C. H. Prince, of the fifth congressional district of the State of Georgia, claiming to have been duly elected members of the Fortieth Congress; and the same were referred to the Committee of Elections.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. FARNSWORTH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1205) to further amend the postal laws, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendments to said bill, with the following amendments: section thirteen, line five, strike out all after "whatever."

At the end of section fourteen add, "all other blank agencies are hereby abolished."

JOHN F. FARNSWORTH,

JOHN HILL,

Managers on the part of the House.

ALEXANDER RAMSEY,

JAMES HARLAN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman from California, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who was a member of the committee of conference, also concurred in this report, but was not present when the report was handed around for signatures.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is correct.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to have read the House bill and the amendments of the Senate to that bill, in order in the first place to see what are the changes which the Senate propose, then what amendments the committee of conference disagree to, and then what the committee agree to.

The SPEAKER. By a ruling of Mr. Speaker Banks, in the Thirty-Fourth Congress, and affirmed upon an appeal to the House, nothing can be read when a conference committee submit a report but that report, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would be glad to have it read, because I think there can be no objection to our being informed in regard to the legislation here proposed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to that because the bill is very long, and I can explain it in less time than it will take to read it. The conferees on the part of the House agree to recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, with amendments. One is to strike out a clause in one of the Senate amendments which authorizes postmasters if they suspect that any letters or circulars concern lotteries to take them from the mails and forward them to the dead letter office. We thought that was a dangerous power to confer upon postmasters, and therefore we have stricken it out. That section provides that it shall be unlawful to deposit in the mails any letters or circulars relating to lotteries, which we thought would be a wise provision. But we thought it would not be wise to give postmasters this extraordinary power to be exercised upon a mere suspicion.

The other amendment to which the conferees agree is to add a provision to the Senate amendment for the establishment of a blank agency of the Post Office Department in the city of Washington, which provision abolishes all other blank agencies. I believe the Department now has four blank agencies, agencies for the distribution of blanks to the post offices of the United States; one in the city of New York, one in Buffalo, I believe, one I think in Cincinnati, and one in Washington. I may be mistaken in the names of the particular places. It is found that it is much more convenient to have but one blank agency, and that here in the city of Washington, at the Department, than to have agencies scattered around through the country. These blank agencies were originally established before the days of railroads, and the means of quick and easy transportation thereby afforded. This establishment of one agency in the city of Washington, in place of all there are now, and the provision for the appointment of the blank agent and the necessary clerks and employes under him, will save the Government at least $600 in expenses. I suppose no one will object to that, because one agency will certainly cost less than four will.

Mr. RAUM. I wish to ask whether all the blanks distributed from this blank agency will be gotten up in Washington city?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Not necessarily.

Mr. RAUM. If everything of that kind be gotten up here, the cost will be twenty per cent. more than in New York.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The existing law requires that the blanks shall be delivered; the only question presented by this bill is as to the establishment of an agency to attend to this business. I will state for the information of the House that this bill as originally passed by the House comprised three sections. The first provided for the return of letters where a direction was placed upon them for return within a certain number of days. The second section provided a different scale from the present for money orders. The third section provided for the free delivery of weekly newspapers within the county where published or within thirty miles of the place of publication, construing and explaining the law passed some years ago, making it more satisfactory to the publishers of weekly newspapers in the country. The Senate has added several sections; and we believe they are all necessary. They have added a section providing for the issuing of a duplicate money order in case of the loss of the original order, proper provision being made to prevent the duplication of orders where the original is not actually lost. There are two or three sections added by the Senate providing for the punishment of forgery and other crimes against the Post Office Department where there seemed to be a lack of necessary legal provision for that purpose.

The Senate has also provided for the appointment of a new officer. There is in the Post Office Department a clerk who takes charge of the foreign mail department. He is only a clerk detailed for that purpose, receiving a salary, I think, of $2,500 a year. This bill proposes to make him the head of a division of foreign mails, and increases his salary by the addition of $500.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to know whether this bill makes any appropriation for the erection of a post office in the city of New York.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir; it does not. I wish to state in regard to the foreign mail service that within the last ten years the postage upon the exchange of letters with foreign countries has increased over one million dollars. The postage now is some two million four hundred thousand dollars upon letters exchanged with foreign countries. We have recently negotiated a number of foreign postal treaties, and this branch of our postal service has become so large that the Department asks, and we have agreed to give it, a superintendent of foreign mail service. The officer who at present takes charge of this branch of business will be the superintendent, his salary being increased by the addition of $500.

The Senate amendment also provides that the Postmaster General may appoint an agent to go out with each of the mails on the mail steamships to China and Japan. At present the law provides that the Postmaster General may send special agents on such service. He does so at a cost, in each case, of $1,600 salary, and I think four dollars a day for expenses. This bill provides that the agent shall be appointed at a salary of $2,000, which is less than the amount already paid to the special agents sent out under the existing law. The bill also provides that the Postmaster General may appoint the necessary agents in China, for the purpose of taking charge of our mails and distributing them there. The House, I suppose, is aware of the fact that we have no postal arrangement with China, China having no postal system. The result is that our mails when sent out there have to be left with the consul. For the extra labor of attending to those mails he receives only such extra pay as the Postmaster General may see fit to give him. Sometimes our consuls cannot take charge of this business. It is a labor which they cannot properly perform for want of the required facilities. It is necessary that the Department should provide some agent for this purpose. The Postmaster General under this bill will employ, at as small an expense as possible, a consul or some other person living out there who will take charge of the mails when they are sent ashore from the steamship and attend to their distribution. I believe,

Mr. Speaker, I have said all that is necessary to be stated in regard to this bill. The conferees on the part of the House were unanimous. I believe I will now call for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope my colleague will yield to me.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. For how long?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Ten minutes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is not sufficient time in which to consider an important bill of this kind. If the House will look at the report and the bill as it will stand they will see that the most of it is composed of matter which has been subjected to the action of the committee of conference. I believe almost the whole bill has been under the action of the committee of conference. I think, therefore, that the space of five minutes is too short in which properly to discuss a bill of this kind. But I have only five minutes, and I must be content with it. The part of the bill to which I wish to call attention, and which is agreed to by the committee of conference, is that which provides for additional offices to the amount of $11,000. Yet such a report from a committee of conference we are asked to put through without full debate. I am allowed only five minutes in which to say a few words. Now, sir, if there is anything which this House has resisted from the commencement of the session up to this moment it is that we shall create no more new offices and increase no more salaries.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman point out the sections to which he refers?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will in detail if the gentleman will give me time. The Senate creates new offices and increases salaries, and I wish my colleague to pay attention to the statement, for I do not believe he is fully advised in reference to the matter. The Senate create the new office of the superintendent of the foreign mails at a salary of $3,000. By whom is he to be appointed? With this large salary is he to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate? No, sir; but it is provided that the Postmaster General shall make the appointment and that the Senate shall have no control over it. That is of itself a sufficient reason why we should not adopt the report of the committee of conference. I would not confide this power to any Postmaster General. I do not know but the Postmaster General would fill this office with a man entirely satisfactory to me; but I would not give that power to any man.

There is one new office at $3,000. Besides that there is one clerk of class four at $1,800. There are also two clerks of class three, $3,200. These are all to be appointed by the Postmaster General. Now, when a postmaster is appointed whose salary amounts to more than $1,000 the appointment has to be confirmed by the Senate. Here all these officers, with salaries as high as $3,000 and all over $1,000, are to be appointed by the Postmaster General without the concurrence of the Senate. Then there is an increase of salary to $2,500, $500 more. Another section creates the chief of the dead-letter office, a new office, with a salary of $2,500, making in all $11,000. I ask any member of the House whether he is satisfied by the showing my colleague has made there is any necessity for these new offices? I think we can get along without them. I think that we have mail agents enough without sending mail agents to Shanghai and other ports. Are we to go on with this kind of business? Are we to have mail agents to China and Japan at these large salaries? I protest against it. But I have not time to go fully into this matter. Here is section eight, which provides for the appointment of a superintendent of foreign mails at an annual salary of $3,000, and for three additional clerks. I ask that the report of the committee of conference be rejected, so that we may have another committee and strike out these new offices and these increase of salaries.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I expected that my colleague would oppose this. Everybody expected that. He says that postmasters with salaries over one thousand dollars have to be confirmed by the Senate. That is true; but there are many officers in the Post Office Department who have salaries up to $3,000, who do not have to go through that process. Now, I say to the House that this bill does not provide for the appointment of a single additional clerk. It provides that certain clerks shall be appointed to certain places, who are already in the Department, being employed as temporary clerks, and drawing the same salaries as clerks. The law now authorizes the Postmaster General to appoint an additional number of temporary clerks. An appropriation was made for that purpose, and he cannot appoint additional clerks beyond the amount of the appropriation for clerk hire. These clerks are always there. A man is already in the Department in charge of the foreign mail service. His salary is increased $500. He has been there fourteen years and has become almost indispensable.

Mr. INGERSOLL. How much does this bill increase the expense in the aggregate?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not think it will increase the expense of the Department $2,000. These agents that are sent out, of whom my colleague complains, are now sent out by the Postmaster General with every one of these mails as special agents.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The table I read does not include them.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not give way to my colleague.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why not? Mr. FARNSWORTH. Because I want to occupy the time myself. I have stated to the House that these agents sent out by the Postmaster General at the present time receive a greater compensation than this bill provides. They now receive $1,600 a year, and four dollars a day in addition for expenses. This bill only proposes to give them $2,000 in all. And so far as establishing agencies in China to take charge of the mail, I leave it to any member of the House whether those mails are to be thrown on shore with nobody to take charge of them. We pay $500,000 a year as subsidy to the steamship company to carry the mails. The service has increased very largely. The Post Office Department must be fostered. It must have the agencies necessary for the purpose of carrying, taking charge of, and distributing the mails, or else we may as well abolish the service. The Postmaster General is only authorized by this bill, so far as establishing agencies in China is concerned, to make such regulations as he can to the best advantage; which he can do with consuls or merchants living at the place where the mails arrive. He can do so at a small expense. We have no postmasters in China; the Chinese have none; you have therefore got to employ a consul or somebody else to take charge of the mails.

Now, sir, as the foreign mail service has increased so that we are to-day reaping $1,000,000 more than we were ten years ago from that service, I ask if it is not proper that we should have a superintendent for the foreign mails. We have made eight or ten postal treaties within the last year, and we shall probably make a good many more. This bill provides also that the clerk who is now at the head of the dead-letter division may be made superintendent of that office. If any gentleman has visited that office he is aware of the immense amount of work done there. There is already an appropriation for this division, and the Department asks that we shall give them the same amount, and they propose that the same man who is now employed in charge of it shall be made superintendent of the dead-letter office.

His salary is increased $500. But on the whole the saving of money in the agencies for the mail service across the Pacific to China and Japan nearly offsets the additional expense in the other case. I call the previous question.

On seconding the previous question, there were—ayes 41, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist on a further count, unless my colleague gives me five minutes.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I cannot. My colleague is anxious to adjourn as early as possible, and so am I now.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report, and call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for tellers on agreeing to the report.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 70, noes 26; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the report on the table.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 30, noes 65; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. COBURN and Mr. PERHAM to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 20, noes 90.

So the House refused to lay the report of the committee of conference on the table.

The question recurred on agreeing to the report of the committee.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBURN and Mr. PERHAM were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 30.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTORS FOR IRON-CLADS.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, pending at the adjournment at twelve o'clock, being the joint resolution (S. R. No. 100) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam machinery. The pending question is to refer the joint resolution to the Committee of Claims, upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PILE. I ask the consent of the House to make a brief statement in regard to the bill.

Mr. WARD. I will yield for a short statement for five minutes.

Mr. PILE. Mr. Speaker, as I understand this case, some thirty vessels were built under contracts with the Government, commencing at the time when gold and the price of labor and materials commenced running up during the war. After they were completed a claim was presented to Congress upon the part of the contractors for additional compensation, basing their claim upon the ground of the increase in the price of labor and materials. A bill passed the Senate, whether upon investigation or not I do not know, granting them $1,800,000. When that bill came to the House the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] reported a substitute from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DELANO. It was reported by the Committee of Claims, but not by me.

Mr. PILE. That substitute directed the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the claims of these contractors, and to ascertain what additional compensation was due them for increase in the price of labor and materials occasioned by delay, which delay was caused by the action of the Government in changing the plan for the construction of the vessels. This substitute was finally adopted and became a law; it was approved March 2, 1867. Under that act the Secretary of the Navy appointed a board. These contractors sent in their claims before that board. And with reference to nine of them, about which I am informed, some of the contractors living in my own city, they were built on exactly the same plan, contracted for about the same time, finished near the same time, and in each of these nine the same alterations were made. The plans and specifications, and all the drawings, were drawn by the same man and furnished to the different contractors. And yet this board allow five of these contractors who are in the East additional compensation and throw out the claims of four of them who are in the West. In addition to the fact that all of these nine vessels were built under exactly the same circumstances as to the specifications and alterations these contractors in the East, as a gentleman informed me a day or two ago, had constant access to the office of the superintendent for the construction of these vessels. They received orders from him for changes eight or ten days in advance of the contractors building vessels in the West, giving them a decided advantage in this particular, and yet, from some singular cause, this board threw out the claims absolutely of those four men in the West, and allow the claims of the five contractors who built their vessels in the East. This bill simply proposes to send these contractors before the Court of Claims, and to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to investigate and ascertain the facts in the case, and adjust the claims upon the basis of the act of March, 1867, simply for the purpose of ascertaining whether this board, appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, did justice to these men or not. They claim that injustice was done in allowing additional compensation to a portion of these contractors, who built these vessels upon exactly the same plan and under the same circumstances, and not allowing it to others. By this bill the Court of Claims is given jurisdiction to reinvestigate these claims and to adjust them, not upon the general basis of allowing compensation for the increase in the cost of labor and materials, but upon the basis of the act of March 2, 1867.

One more remark: Congress still hold in their power the full control of this matter. If the Court of Claims award damages to these parties the money must be appropriated by Congress. If this bill be referred to the Committee of Claims it will go over until the next session of Congress; and even if it is then passed in the form in which it now stands the matter will be postponed until next summer before you can get a decision from the Court of Claims; and it will be a year from next winter before a final settlement can be made. These men have already laid out of their money for two or two and a half years. So far as those men are concerned who live in St. Louis I know they are absolutely bankrupt by the construction of these vessels; that their contracts for the iron that was used in these vessels are still unpaid, and the men are unable to pay until they get this relief. And if they are to have any relief at all, if the Court of Claims decide they are to have anything, they ought to receive it, and receive it speedily. I hope the matter will not be postponed for eighteen months longer by referring this bill to the Committee of Claims. It has received the examination of the Committee of Claims in the Senate, it was very fully discussed in the Senate, and passed that body by a very large majority.

Mr. WARD. This is a very important bill, as will be seen upon examination. The bill has never been considered by any committee of this House. It comes from the Senate, and has been upon the Speaker's table since it came here. It proposes to permit a large number of contractors for building iron-clads during the war to go into the Court of Claims and have their claims adjudicated there. It seems to me that it is eminently proper that this bill should be committed for investigation to a regularly-appointed committee of this House, whose duty it is to investigate all claims of this or any other character, and to submit the result of their investigation to this House for its information.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WARD. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. Has there not been an investigation of these claims by a commission of naval officers appointed by the Navy Department, and have they not decided against them?

Mr. WARD. I was about to say that there is a history connected with these iron-clad claims. In the Thirty-Ninth Congress these cases were referred to the Committee of Claims, who investigated them carefully. A report was made from that committee authorizing the reference of all these cases—those now under consideration, as well as all others relating to the construction of iron-clads—to a board to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy. That board was to act upon certain principles which were set forth in the measure reported by the committee. The report of the committee was adopted by Congress. The board was appointed, and I understand investigated several cases, among them the cases embraced in this bill. It is claimed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PILE] that the claims of the parties he represents here were rejected by that board. It is claimed that injustice has been done by that commission. That is one of the very questions that we want to investigate, one of the very matters upon which the House desires to be informed. It is for this reason among others that I desire the reference of the bill to a committee. Let it go to a committee and be examined; and if injustice has been done to these parties I have no doubt the committee will insist that justice shall be done.

Mr. Speaker, I am not here in hostility to this measure. It is true that I have had something to do with investigating these claims; it is true that I have had some grave suspicions in reference to their justice; but I am not here to say that they are unjust and ought not to be paid. I do say, however, that these claims, having been once rejected by a committee appointed to investigate them, should not be referred to the Court of Claims unless this House shall so decide after due investigation. If by the passage of this bill we send these cases to the Court of Claims, we surrender all power over them. We throw open that court to every contractor for iron-clads in the land. We permit everybody to go in there on an ex parte case and succeed if he can. I am opposed to our surrendering our control over this matter. Gentlemen tell us that if the Court of Claims should decide in favor of these claims, we can refuse to make the appropriation. We might; but that has not been the custom. The judgments of the Court of Claims have usually been regarded as conclusive and final.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman tell us how much these claims would amount to as presented by the contractors themselves?

Mr. WARD. I cannot give the gentleman the precise figures, but I understand they go into the millions.

Mr. MAYNARD. Several millions, I understand.

Mr. WARD. Are we prepared now, without investigation and upon the mere assertion of gentlemen here that these claims are just, to send to this court for examination claims to the amount of millions? I demand the previous question.

Mr. PILE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. WARD. In view of the late period of the session I am urged on all sides not to yield. My judgment is that we ought to take up no more time with this matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the previous question should be sustained it will not exhaust itself on the motion to refer should that motion be negatived, but will continue to operate until the third reading of the bill.

Mr. WARD. Would it be in order for me now to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN?]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can yield by withdrawing the call for the previous question.

Mr. WARD. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to know anything particularly in reference to these claims except that presented by one of my constituents who claims compensation for the building of one of these vessels. I know that this gentleman, Mr. Bestor, of Peoria, Illinois, has by reason of his contract made with the Government become a bankrupt; and I know that injustice has been done to him by not allowing him the same opportunity of prosecuting his claim as has been allowed to others. Now, I merely desire to correct a statement which has been made here, calculated to do injustice to this constituent of mine; I am not speaking with reference to any of the other claimants, for I know nothing about them. It has been stated that these claims amount to millions of dollars. I say such is not the case; and any gentleman making such a statement certainly does not understand the facts. It has also been stated that these claims were rejected by a board appointed by the Navy Department. That also is not the fact. I will state the facts as they are. A naval board was appointed for the purpose of examining into what was known as the iron-clad claims. These were numerous and reached enormous amounts. But this board reported, as gentlemen will find by examining the report, that they did not consider the claims embraced in this bill as within their province. These claims were excluded because that naval board did not understand that they had authority to examine them under the purview of the resolution providing for the appointment of the board. That is the fact as I understand it. I mean the board appointed of naval officers. These claims, I understand, have not been acted on by that board.

Now, sir, it is strange to me that in the examination of these claims by this board only the large claims presented to it were allowed and reported back to this House, and this House has passed a bill for the payment of the large claims only. The larger number of these claimants claim only small amounts. They are the men who built the light draught vessels, but they happen to live in the West. It is strange that the men who are excluded are men from west of Philadelphia; while the claims that have been allowed are from Philadelphia east. I do not know how that occurred, but it is the fact. But, sir, I desire, so far as the claim of my constituent is concerned, to say—

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to correct the gentleman's phraseology. It should be Philadelphia west, for no Philadelphia claimant was embraced in the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. That is what I am saying. All I want to say in reference to this is, that so far as my constituent is concerned—and I understand the other claims are of a similar character—that these claims should be referred to the Court of Claims. Let them go before the Court of Claims. I have some information of the Court of Claims. I know the men upon that court. There is one gentleman from my own State. I would trust him as soon as any man upon the face of God's earth. I do not believe they would decide that these men were entitled to this money unless their claims were just and proper. All the claimants want is to be permitted to go before the Court of Claims and to have their claims passed upon by that court on their merits. Now, I wish to know whether there is any fraud in that? If these claimants cannot go before the Court of Claims for the purpose of having them acted upon and adjudicated, I should like to know then what these courts were created for? If we cannot have confidence in our courts that they will do justice between the Government and claimants; if we cannot trust them, and Congress is to investigate all these cases, why, then, let us wipe these courts out of existence. If they are referred to the Committee of Claims, when will that committee report? We are now at the heel of the session. Report when? Perhaps next Congress, and perhaps not.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARD. I desire to say this, Mr. Speaker, that if I yield to any one at all I will yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, who has, perhaps, some information on this subject. Before I do that I will say that I do not think the gentleman's constituents will suffer by the reference of his case to the Committee of Claims. I do not think there is any more doubt of the integrity of that committee than there is about that of the Court of Claims.

Mr. LOGAN. I am not questioning that.

Mr. WARD. I do not think it will take longer to have the claims investigated by the Committee of Claims than by the Court of Claims. I do not see the necessity of going out of Congress, away from our own committees, which can just as well pass on the question. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] and then I will demand the previous question.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Has this bill under consideration ever been acted upon by any committee of this House?

Mr. WARD. Not this particular bill, but this particular class of claims has.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Why not refer it to a committee of this House?

Mr. WARD. That is all we want to do.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WARD. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely desire to say a single word for the purpose of putting the matter right. The gentleman says this claim has not been before a committee. Now, I say that this claim was before the Committee of Claims in a former Congress. It was referred to the Navy Department. A board was appointed to consider it and the board decided that they did not consider that they had a right to investigate it. It was before the committee a year ago.

Mr. WARD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. PIKE. I am a little surprised at the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] upon the question now before the House. Either he misunderstands it or I do. His position is that these claimants should have the same rights before the Court of Claims that any other citizen has. So far I concur with him heartily. But if by that he means that this bill gives them the same rights that any other citizen has, and no more, there I dissent from him. This bill provides that the Court of Claims shall take jurisdiction, which without this bill they cannot do, of this class of claims, because these men have no legal claims upon the Government. If they had a legal claim there is no need whatever of this bill. Every citizen is entirely free to go before the Court of Claims with a legal claim. The only question is whether we shall confer special jurisdiction of this class of claims. For one, I am opposed to it unless there be further investigation by a committee of this House. And I say this to the House from a knowledge of these claims from the beginning. These parties came here in the Thirty-Eighth Congress. Then the gross amount of their claims was some seven or eight million dollars. An investigation was had by the Naval Committee and the committee reported the matter to the House at the heel of the session, just as this now comes before the House. On the very last night it was attempted to get it through. I was on the minority of the committee, and with the help of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] it was resisted and defeated. It was afterward referred to the Committee of Claims. It was there investigated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] and I ask him to take up my statement where I leave it. These claims for $7,000,000 can easily be rejuvenated until they swell into as great proportions as this House, in its utmost liberality, will be disposed to give, and the question is now whether, on the heel of the session, without investigation, we shall take this step which may lead to that result? I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DELANO. I do not intend in the discussion of this question to express any opinion of my own as to how any member of the House ought to vote, but I will endeavor to lay the facts of the case before the House, so that every member can judge of them for himself. In the first place, in the Thirty-Eighth Congress the Senate passed a resolution appointing a board of naval officers to investigate the claim of certain contractors for iron-clad vessels. Under that resolution forty-eight contractors presented their cases to the board and obtained an award of $2,500,000. On that report the Senate passed a bill appropriating for those contractors $1,800,000. That bill came to the House during the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and was referred to the Committee of Claims. On examination of the case we found that the board appointed by the Senate had made allowances for damages which arose from an inflation of the currency.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DELANO. I ask the gentleman from New York to allow me to finish my statement.

Mr. WARD. I yield two minutes. I cannot yield any more.

Mr. DELANO. Thereupon the House passed a rule settling these claims, which was this: that where contractors had suffered by the action of the Government, not only these forty-eight claimants, but all other contractors for iron-clads, causing delays or alterations in the contracts, the Government should pay the damage, but should not pay in any other case. That rule was adopted by a joint resolution of the House and Senate, which became a law in place of the bill appropriating $1,800,000. Under that rule a board was established, and before that board these claims have been brought. Part of them have been allowed, and those allowed we have paid at this session. Part of them have been rejected, and those whose claims were rejected under that rule now by this bill ask for a hearing again before the Court of Claims. And all you have to say now is whether you will award to these persons whose claims have been once examined under this rule a rehearing, and keep this thing open for an indefinite length of time, or whether you will refer the question back to the Committee of Claims and obtain their opinion as to the propriety of giving a new hearing before the Court of Claims. It is a simple question of giving to these men an additional hearing.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PIKE. I merely wish to say that this bill directs the Court of Claims to investigate and adjudicate these cases upon the same rule that bound this board, which rule was not adhered to, as these men claim, by the board, and the Court of Claims can only decide under that rule.

Mr. WARD. I resume the floor and demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; being upon the motion of Mr. WARD, to refer the bill to the Committee of Claims.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 80, noes 29.

So the bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1433) to amend an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, was recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The bill was read. It provides that the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, shall be so amended that whenever a person settling on the public domain, under the provisions of said act, shall make satisfactory proof that he has served not less than one year in the Army of the United States during the late war for the suppression of rebellion, and has been honorably discharged, or has been honorably discharged for wounds or disability after a less period of service, he shall be entitled to receive a patent or certificate after the expiration of one year from the entry of the land, as prescribed in said act.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The only object of this bill is to reduce to the soldier the length of time of actual settlement required in order to get a homestead. In the naturalization laws we have reduced the time from five years to one year, and now we propose to reduce the time of settlement under the homestead law from five years to one year for the soldier. If no gentleman desires to ask any questions, I will call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope there will be no objection to this bill. It is in lieu of the bounty bill which we have not time to pass, and it will answer many of the purposes of that bill.

The question was taken on the motion to reconsider; and it was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BINGHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few minutes that I may make a report from the Committee on Accounts. I am in ill health and must go home.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to the gentleman if it will lead to no debate or delay.

Mr. BROOMALL. It can lead to no debate or delay.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let a vote be taken on the resolutions without the reading of the report.

Mr. BROOMALL. That is my idea.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield on condition that it gives rise to no debate or delay.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Accounts, in the matter of the charges against the officers of the House. The report is accompanied by three resolutions, which I propose to have put on their passage at once.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the resolutions be read.

Mr. NIBLACK. Let the report be also read.

Mr. BINGHAM. I cannot yield for that.

Mr. WOOD. I understand that this matter will give rise to debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I want the evidence to be read, also.

Mr. BINGHAM. That will take all day. I will yield to the gentleman to introduce his report, have it printed and laid on the table, and then he can enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will ask to have the report printed and recommitment.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall ask to have the report read.

Mr. BROOMALL. Then I withdraw the report.

COURT OF CLAIMS—ALABAMA.

Mr. HAUGHEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 357) placing the loyal citizens of the State of Alabama on equal terms with citizens of other States, according to the act of July 4, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION.

Mr. SYPHER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1449) to enforce the third section of the fourteenth article of amendments to the Constitution; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAL-ORDER SYSTEM WITH FRANCE.

Mr. SYPHER, by unanimous consent, also submitted a resolution instructing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report measures to authorize a postal and money-order system between the United States and France; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Reconstruction, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1450) to provide for the more speedy reorganization of the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The first section provides that for the better security of persons and property in Texas, Virginia, and Mississippi, the constitutional conventions in each of these States heretofore elected under and in pursuance of an act of Congress passed March 2, 1867, entitled "An act for the more efficient government of the rebel States," and the special acts of Congress supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof shall be authorized to exercise the following powers in addition to the powers now authorized by law, to wit: to make removals and appointments of the officers of the provisional governments in said States respectively; to authorize the provisional governments of said States respectively to remove and appoint registers and judges of elections under said acts of Congress, which registers and judges of election shall not be eligible to any elective office under such provisional governments, and shall observe the provisions of said acts of Congress; to organize and maintain a constabulary force in each of said States for the preservation of peace and to aid in the execution of the laws; to provide by ordinance for the reassembling of the said conventions from time to time, and for holding all elections authorized by said acts of Congress, and for ascertaining and declaring the results of such elections, and especially the result of any election which may be held for the ratification or rejection of any constitution which said several conventions may submit to the people of either of said States; and to pass such ordinances not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States as may be necessary to protect all persons therein in their lives, liberty, and property.

The second section provides that the special ordinances which may be passed by the constitutional convention of either of said States as herein provided for, shall be enforced by the provisional governments of said States until disapproved by Congress or until such States shall have adopted a constitution of State government, and the same shall have been approved by Congress, provided that nothing contained in this act shall deprive any person of trial by jury in the courts of said States for offenses against the laws of said States.

The third section provides that the military commanders in each of the States named shall give aid to the officers of the provisional government in preserving the peace and enforcing the laws, and especially in suppressing unlawful obstructions and forcible resistance to the execution of the laws.

The fourth section provides that on the fourth Wednesday after the passage of this act the convention of Mississippi and Virginia shall reassemble, and the convention of Mississippi shall proceed to frame a constitution of State government and submit the same to the people, under and in pursuance of the provisions of the act of Congress before mentioned and of this act.

The fifth section provides for the repeal of all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that we ought to have this bill printed before acting on it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] yield for a motion that the bill be printed?

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir.

Mr. BECK. As a member of the subcommittee, as well as of the committee, I would like to have some little time to discuss this subject.

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman for thirty minutes.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Speaker, while I approve fully of what purports to be the object of the bill as set forth in the preamble, and desire as earnestly as any gentleman on the Reconstruction Committee to protect the life, liberty, and property of every person in those so-called unconstructed States, be they white or black, without regard to their political antecedents or present opinion, I believe that the bill now proposed so far from effecting the object intended will have directly a contrary effect.

I ask gentlemen to bear in mind that at present the General of the Army or the department commanders has the absolute power to appoint any one he may select as provisional governor over those States, to remove any official, high or low, who does not do his duty, and to put those there who will do it. He, in conjunction with the department commanders, has unlimited power to call upon and use the Army of the United States for the purpose of enforcing and preserving the peace and maintaining order. Besides, the Freedmen's Bureaus, already established there, can aid in protecting the life, liberty, and property of the citizens if they desire to do so. These instrumentalities are surely more potent than any that can be exercised by constitutional conventions. If they are not I do not understand why they are not.

This bill makes provision with reference to three States; let me call attention to them severally, as well as I can in the thirty minutes allowed me. First, as to the State of Virginia; what is the condition of things there? Virginia has held her convention; she has framed her constitution; she has appealed to us to pass a law to enable her to hold an election for its ratification, and for the election of State officers and members of Congress under it. We have passed a bill for that purpose, and that bill is now pending in the Senate of the United States. Nothing remains to be done in Virginia but for her people to vote whether they will adopt or reject the constitution; and to elect officers under it if they decide to adopt it. There is no complaint that in Virginia the lives and property of loyal men are not now thoroughly protected. There is no allegation that the convention has not finished its work. That convention has adjourned; and nothing now remains but for us to fix a day for the election. By the bill already passed by this House we have done so. We have done it in strict accordance with the reconstruction acts of Congress. Why, then, is this new order of things proposed? Gentlemen on the Reconstruction Committee will bear me out in saying that, so far at least as Virginia is concerned, this is an effort on the part of the ultra Republican leaders there to set aside and nullify the reconstruction acts in that State.

The object of this bill, though I do not think the committee concur in that object—the real purpose of the men who manipulated and projected this bill is to put all power into the hands of a few ultra Radical leaders in that convention, and to deprive of the right of suffrage twenty-five thousand white men in that State. The present provisional governor of Virginia, Governor Wells, came before the Reconstruction Committee, and when called upon by our chairman to state what he wanted he said, almost in the very words which I now repeat, (and the committee will sustain me in the statement,) that in the first place he wanted liberal appropriations to carry on the election. That we have given them; we have appropriated $93,000. He wanted no further registration, because, as he said, there were to-day twenty-five thousand white men in the State of Virginia, who, under the present reconstruction laws, are entitled to be registered and vote, and if registered they would carry the State against the Republican party. He wanted to disfranchise twenty-five thousand white voters in that State. He further said that if they were permitted to adhere to the registration which took place last year, when a great many white men refused to register, that they would carry the State, as they could, if an early day was fixed, get the negro vote solid and get enough white votes to give them a majority for the constitution and the Radical candidates. The Reconstruction Committee treated the infamous proposition with the scorn and contempt it deserved. There was not a member of the committee who did not refuse to adopt that proposition. It was afterward urged, time and again, before us by a man by the name of Williamson, an emissary of the Radicals in Virginia, he undertaking to argue and to show that Wells's opinion was, that under the reconstruction laws it was not necessary nor proper to open the registration for revision as required by the seventh section of the act of July, 1867, although it had been done everywhere, and appropriation after appropriation had been made by Congress for that purpose. He even prepared a bill striking out of the bill which I had drawn and which the committee adopted and this House passed, all that part of the fourth section relating to the board of registration, and out of the first section which submitted the proposed constitution to the voters of Virginia in August next, "who shall then be registered and qualified as such in compliance with the acts of Congress known as the reconstruction acts," and inserting in lieu thereof "who were registered and qualified to vote for delegates to said convention, and none others." His proposition was at once rejected, as Wells's had been. The proposition to set aside all the reconstruction laws and disfranchise twenty-five thousand white men who were as much entitled to register and vote as any men in Virginia, was an outrage too monstrous to be tolerated or entertained for a moment, merely to place a few partisans in power.

One of the great objections to the present bill is that while it recognizes and requires a revised and corrected registration, as provided by law—a right the existence of which no man in this House doubts—it puts all power into the hands of Wells and others of that sort, who will refuse to carry out any provision which does not suit them, and being wholly irresponsible they will rely on the success of their outrages as sufficient vindication for their party for all the wrongs committed. As I said, the bill which passed this House, as reported from the Committee on Reconstruction, allowed all to vote who were entitled to vote under the reconstruction laws, requiring a revision and correction of the lists. Now, this bill is brought forward for the purpose—that is the effect, if not the intention—of enabling these men, who are seeking to disfranchise twenty-five thousand white men, to so manipulate the election as to put it entirely within their control. Such is the character of this bill which is to be hurried through this House under the pretense that it is to protect life, liberty, and property. It is, so far as Virginia is concerned, for the purpose, and purpose alone, of disfranchising these twenty-five thousand white men who are entitled to vote, and throwing the election into the hands of a set of unscrupulous adventurers who are restrained by no principle, who have no interest in the State or her people, and who are looking solely to self-aggrandizement, regardless of the rights of the people of Virginia.

Let me state another fact. The registration in Richmond last fall was so fraudulent that it was set aside in March last, and a new one was ordered by General Schofield, when eleven hundred white men were added to the registration list. Under the view taken and bill prepared by Wells and company, that new registration was to be set aside, and the old fraudulent list restored, and thus eleven hundred legal and now registered white voters in the city of Richmond alone were to be disfranchised, as none of them were qualified to vote for delegates to the convention which framed the constitution. The very effort made to pass such a bill as they proposed ought to be conclusive evidence to this House that such men are wholly unworthy to intrust with any power, and that no man's life, liberty, or right, will be respected by them, yet this bill proposes to make them omnipotent.

I may as well mention a fact in this connection, which, perhaps, more than all others induced men to withhold their names from the registration list last fall. The people of Virginia denied, as they were warranted in doing by the decision of the Supreme Court ex parte Mulligan, that the reconstruction acts were valid, or that they could properly be put under martial law, or under negro rule, or be tried by military tribunals in time of peace when all the courts, State and Federal, were open; and many of them declined to register, lest by so doing they should be giving a seeming sanction to the validity of such acts. Yet they determined to make no decided opposition; they were anxious to be again restored to civil government, and did not care to oppose the calling of a convention on the formation of a constitution. They desired to have one, and if such a constitution was framed as comported with their ideas of true republican liberty, they were willing to acquiesce in it and permit it to become the fundamental law of the State. They knew that they had the right under the reconstruction laws to register and vote for or against any constitution that might be tendered for their acceptance or rejection by the convention, and the character of the instrument presented would determine their action. Acting under these laws, and relying upon the rights therein granted, they failed to register or take any part in the matter till now, and now, when they claim the right secured to them by existing laws, they are placed under the absolute dominion of a set of men whose past conduct and whose avowals here show conclusively that they intend to withhold all these rights and to disregard everything except what is necessary to their own advancement. As a specimen, I find the following in the Washington city papers this morning:

"Southern Unionists in Convention.—A meeting of the Representatives-elect and 'loyal' Union men of the southern States was held on Wednesday morning at the Washington House at nine o'clock for the purpose of discussing and maturing a plan by which their political aspirations can be most readily attained."

"Resolved, That in the judgment of this meeting Congress ought to legislate immediately for the relief of the loyal people of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, in such way as will secure to these States loyal civil governments."

"Mr. S. D. Williamson, of Virginia, presented a statement of affairs in his State. The military government of General Schofield was examined, and his counsel to the State convention sharply criticised as bringing about disorganization in the Republican ranks. General Schofield postponed the State election contrary to the enactments of Congress. Mr. Williamson said he had presented a memorial to Congress, but no relief had been obtained as yet. Unless something was promptly done there would not be a loyal white voter left in the State of Virginia. He wanted Congress to make provision for the restoration of the power of the Republican party. They had nothing to hope for unless Congress did something immediately. General Stoneman, the successor of General Schofield, followed the plans of his predecessor, and had said he should continue to do so. He had been appealed to to allow the election to be held. He understood that General Stoneman had been appointed the successor of General Schofield at the request of the latter, and he accepted the position of Secretary of War on condition only that General Stoneman should be appointed his successor. Governor Wells, the present Governor, was considered a loyal man, as is also Judge Underwood, the president of the convention.

The meeting resolves that the States of Virginia, Texas, and Mississippi, must be made loyal by Congress. Unless something is done promptly there will not be a loyal white voter left in the State of Virginia, said Williamson; he had presented a memorial to Congress (I have shown you what it was) and had as yet obtained no relief. They are getting relief now with a vengeance, and that promptly. Wells and Underwood will make Virginia loyal if they have to disfranchise every white man in the State, and I suppose this Congress would indorse the act and proclaim any man or any party revolutionists who would say that they had not the perfect right to do so.

But I must hasten on. How is it with the State of Mississippi? Her convention is to reassemble to remove and appoint all officers of the provisional government; to authorize the provisional governor they may appoint to remove and appoint all registrars and judges of elections; to organize and maintain a constabulary force, (of armed negroes, of course;) to ascertain and determine the result of all elections, and especially the election determining the adoption or rejection of the proposed constitution; to pass any ordinances they please, even if these ordinances disfranchise every white man in the State, and all such ordinances shall be valid until disapproved by Congress. Of course whether they are disapproved or not will depend altogether on whether they manage to carry the State for Grant and elect Radicals to fill all the offices. The Mississippi carpet-baggers were at the meeting last night also, and they put in their demands thus:

"General G. C. McKee, of Mississippi, said the condition of affairs in his State was somewhat mixed. He claimed that there were frauds at the recent election, and was ready to establish that fact, but the Reconstruction Committee had refused to listen to them. The State could be secured to the Republican party if they were allowed to poll all their votes. A bill was pending before Congress which looked for the relief of the Republicans in that State. He was opposed to Congress adjourning at the present time.

General Gillem, who is at the head of the military department in Mississippi, was the personal friend of President Johnson, and, of course, no favors or protection could be hoped for while such things were permitted to exist. A new provisional government was needed, and it was to be hoped Congress would take some action before adjourning.

"Mr. J. Railsback, of Mississippi, said he could indorse the remarks of his friend, General McKee. It was hard for the Republicans to secure the elections or the cooperation of the negroes. He was opposed to this one-sided arrangement, and looked upon the recent elections as a perfect farce. Congress must come to our assistance or the Republicans will be entirely demoralized. If Congress did not come to their relief he should return to his native State, Indiana. He was a carpet-bagger, and was proud of the title. This class were 'played out,' congressional assistance to the contrary notwithstanding. They had spent all their funds, and were waiting for something to turn up that will bring them relief."

Railsback was defeated for Congress, and feels like going home to Indiana unless something turns up. This bill will make him drift back with his carpet-bag to Mississippi. Congress has come to his assistance; he will be in funds as soon as the convention gets a fresh hold on the people, and the one-sided farce of an election will be repeated, with the white men out in the cold; and this is Republican liberty and law.

For a week or more a parcel of fellows, claiming to be from Mississippi and the representatives of their convention, hung round the Reconstruction Committee room pretending to have evidence of fraud and false voting, and returns sufficient to show that eight or ten of the largest and most populous Democratic counties in the State ought to be rejected, and the constitution declared adopted, and the Radical office-seekers proclaimed elected. They asserted that a committee of five had been appointed by some ordinance of the convention to determine whether the constitution was adopted or not, although the reconstruction laws vested that power exclusively in the department commander, and required all returns upon that subject to be made to him, and that they had the evidences necessary to make out their claim from that committee. While they were thus pressing their demands and urging immediate action a telegram announced that General Gillem had forwarded all the returns to the President. These returns came, and the report was laid before the committee, accompanied by full returns from all the registrars, judges of election, post commanders, &c., with a full and clear exhibit of all his acts and orders as department commander, falsifying all the statements and allegations of the committee of the convention, and establishing beyond all peradventure the defeat of the constitution by a majority of 7,620, and the election of a Democratic Governor and Legislature, and four of the five members of Congress, by decisive majorities. This report silenced the convention emissaries; from that day to this they have not opened their mouths before the committee, as such. None of their evidences of fraud or unfairness have ever been filed. General Gillem's report not only falsifies their assertions, but shows how utterly reckless the convention and its committee is. Perhaps that is the reason why all power is to be given to it by this bill.

I have not time to read the report of General Gillem which I hold in my hand, far less to read the numerous orders and reports on which he bases it. He shows how the convention, under the power given to it by Congress, to levy a tax to defray the expenses of that body, undertook to tax all trades and occupations in the State: street brokers, $100 each; $50,000 on the railroad corporations, which by the State laws could not be taxed, requiring the sheriff to collect taxes from citizens in ten days, and a number of other acts equally arbitrary, illegal, and oppressive, demonstrating that the only object of that body was to oppress, extort from, and eat out the substance of that people, which was, indeed, their only mission to the State. Yet this is the power sought to be restored, with gangs of armed negroes at their back, under pretense of protecting the lives and property of the people. All these outrages General Gillem opposed as best he could, and his doing so was doubtless the cause of his temporary removal. He shows further that he took every means possible to secure a fair and free election. He supplied registration papers to the negroes especially who had lost the originals. He extended the time of voting in populous districts for their benefit. He appointed supervisors to visit the registrars and judges of elections and instruct them as to their duties. He distributed the soldiers under his command so as to have them at sixty-three different points in the State while the elections were progressing, charging them to aid the civil officers and see that neither force nor intimidation was resorted to; in short, he took all the precautions possible to secure peace, good order, and a fair and free election, and closed his report thus:

"On the 10th instant the boards of registration of the various counties having all made their returns, as required by the fourth section of the act of March 23, 1867, they were consolidated, and show the following as the result. [Here follows a full tabular statement.] He adds:

The foregoing table shows that there were cast—
For the constitution.....56,231 votes.
Against the constitution.....63,860 votes.

And therefore there is a majority of.....7,629 against the constitution."

He says:

"As is generally the case in elections fraud is charged by both parties. All reports and complaints bearing on this subject are herewith transmitted for the consideration of the proper authority, merely remarking that I am satisfied the election was as fair and free from intimidation or the influence of fraud as it would be possible to secure under existing circumstances, and that no undue influence was exercised at the polls. If intimidation was used at all it was beyond the power of the military to reach it."

That report thus wholly uncontradicted, even by the men who before its receipt were loud in their charges of fraud, seems to me absolutely conclusive on both propositions. First, that the constitution was fairly defeated; and second, that a convention such as that in Mississippi is shown by the report and the conduct of their agents to be, is the last body of men upon earth in whose hands the protection of either the lives, the liberty, or the property of that people ought to be intrusted, especially with such arbitrary and despotic powers as this bill proposes to invest them.

How is it with Texas? The convention has been in session in that State since the first Monday in June, and has not yet finished its labors, waiting, as I believe they admit, for congressional action, either to divide the State or increase their power and authority. Complaints are made that the lives of the citizens are insecure there. To some extent I suppose that is true, and always has been. But if the reports are true why not order your military commanders to exercise their authority. Your commanders have power given them in your reconstruction law to appoint any officials they please to execute their will in that district. Why not send down there such forces as will enable General Reynolds to protect the people? Cannot he do it better than the convention? General Reynolds is a Republican beyond all question. Governor Pease is an ultra Republican. The Freedmen's Bureau is there. You are withdrawing your armies from every other part of the South; if the five thousand soldiers now there are not enough for Texas send twenty thousand. Protect the people, but protect them all, and do not allow a few men to take possession of the State and control affairs for their own purposes. The charges of murders of loyal men so freely and recklessly made for party purposes are grossly exaggerated.

I hold in my hand a speech made by Judge Evans, of Texas, on the 6th day of this month, in the Texas convention on that subject, which proves the facts as I assert them. I will say to the House that his loyalty will be vouched for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] for he was the man who was the principal in consultation with him as to the division of the State. He will be vouched for by that gentleman as one of the most distinguished men in Texas. I will read a few extracts from the speech.

"Mr. President, I had not expected that the rules would be suspended for immediate action on this resolution, and therefore I am not prepared to submit my objections in their logical order.

"If I should manifest more than ordinary feeling and embarrassment on this occasion, I hope gentlemen will bear with me, for no man who loves his country can hear this report and contemplate, unmoved, the consequences which will flow from this resolution if adopted.

"When this measure was first introduced, I learn that it was designed to cover others, which, taken together, constitute a series of acts looking to the establishment of a species of government in Texas which cannot be justified, unless both the facts stated in this report on lawlessness and crime, and the inferences drawn therefrom, are correct. The first of these, suggested by Governor Pease's message, was a request that Congress would give to this body the control of the boards of registrars. Next came the appropriation of $25,000 to be placed in the hands of the Governor, to enable him to employ a corps of detectives or secret spies under the pretense of bringing criminals to justice. Then follows the bill asking of Congress the power to organize a loyal militia for the State of Texas.

"The design and tendency of these measures is the organization of an unmitigated and cruel despotism for the benefit of a class of politicians who supinely asked this convention and the Congress to place them in power and continue them in power by the bayonet.

"The report as concocted is charging the entire Democratic and Conservative masses of Texas as a band of lawless murderers, or raiders, abettors, and apologists of the murderers of defenseless loyalists—murdered in cold blood for their loyalty.

"Whether the facts upon which this report purports to be based are true or not I am not prepared to say.

"I offered this morning the resolution asking that the committee produce the records of crime and statements of witnesses on which they rely. This request was, as I anticipated, denied me. I felt sure that those who dealt such wholesale denunciations against their political opponents would not dare let the transactions of their committee-room ever come to the light of day.

"Let me ask the members of this convention if they are prepared to indorse these sweeping denunciations against their neighbors and friends?

"Take the committee's table of homicides from the date of the surrender in 1865 to the present time, from which it appears there were only seventy-seven homicides during the year 1865. The smallness of these numbers is indeed surprising when we take into consideration the condition of our unhappy country.

"The most terrible war of any age has just closed. The Governor and all the principal officers of the State were fugitives—the whole machinery of civil government was broken up, and by mere force of the moral and intellectual character of its people anarchy was averted. Of the seventy-seven homicides it does not appear that any one of them was killed for his loyalty. I submit that it is well known that many of these so-called homicides were public executions of murderers and robbers by society.

"That lawlessness and violence are, and have been ever since then, steadily on the increase, I well understand, and am able to point to the true cause, the want of all civil authority and the contest of extremists for power."

"The idea of usurping the political control would never have occurred to the colored people had they not been stimulated to make the demand, and I appeal to you, (addressing himself to the colored delegates,) and through you to your race, do not listen to the suggestions of the demagogues, traitors to society, who lead you in the impracticable effort to control the political power of this country. You must understand that no church or society can live in peace in which the minority undertakes to control the majority."

"At this Hon. Morgan Hamilton objected to the latitude of the remarks. (Mr. Caldwell and other gentlemen insisted that he be permitted to proceed.)

"Judge Evans continued: Under the reconstruction laws there are registered one hundred and four thousand voters; in round numbers forty thousand colored and sixty-four thousand whites; of these sixty-four thousand whites not more than ten thousand have united with colored—not quite sufficient to give them the majority. The design of this resolution and the threatened measures is nothing less than the demand that Congress shall, by a change in the reconstruction laws, place these leaders in power, give to them the control of the registrars, who will strike from the list a sufficient number of whites to insure their own election to office, and to be prepared with armed negro troops to maintain the usurpation. You, by these measures are striking a fatal blow at republican government; you render reconstruction impossible.

"Congress finally yielded to the importunities of these loyalists, and passed reconstruction laws, defining the qualifications of votes in Texas. Under the operation of these laws a large portion of the white voters of 1865 were disfranchised, and all adult colored males enfranchised, which gave, in round numbers, one hundred and four thousand loyal voters. This result is not satisfactory to Governor Pease; therefore he suggests that a sufficient number of whites be disfranchised to insure him in power. Now he schemes to arm the blacks to carry by the bayonet his infamous schemes. Twenty-five thousand dollars have been placed at his disposal to form that odious instrument of despots, a corps of detectives. Already is there opened in the state department a secret recruiting office for the enrollment of negro troops.

"Mr. Caldwell here interrupted, denying the charge.

"Judge Evans. I refer the honorable gentleman to the members of the convention who have been called on to furnish their quota of names of negroes for his militia.

"Now, I tell the honorable chairman of the committee [Caldwell] that he is engaging in a perilous enterprise. Should he succeed in his mission in carrying into effect the mandates of his committee, and go to Jefferson and attempt to continue himself in office by sufficient number of qualified voters to control the election, and attempt to exclude those against him by armed negroes, he will be resisted, and he ought to be resisted.

"To what lamentable depths are we reduced! A set of politicians distributing the votes of Texas, and asking this convention to shape matters as to place them in power and keep them in power by bayonets! Where is all this to end? When military despotism is once established it creates a necessity for its continuance. And is this to be the normal condition of Texas? No, no! This is not reconstruction. It is provocation of war, and will be met by war. Now, I opine that the sixty thousand Conservative voters are just as loyal and as true as are the colored voters and their white allies. And you represent this large and respectable body of voters as aiders and abettors of crime, or apologists of crime! What can you expect?

"I appeal to any member on this floor to say if he does not know that his neighbors—his Democratic and Conservative neighbors—are not as loyal and orderly and peaceful as the most ardent Republican? Do you not know that these outrages are committed by a few lawless men, some of whom belong not to Texas, but are filibusters from other States? Do you not know that the people, without reference to party, in some counties stand in awe of them? The remedy for these evils is a speedy organization of civil government under the reconstruction laws—on basis to command the respect of the country."

Mr. Mullins, a Democratic or Conservative member of that convention, also made a speech on the same day, and he, as well as Judge Evans, shows that this scheme, which is now being put through this House under pretense of protection to the people, was a mere device of Pease and his associates, which the Virginia and Mississippi carpet-baggers have adopted; for these States were on yesterday tacked on to this bill after it was prepared for Texas alone, nobody pretending that there was any unusual amount of lawlessness in either of these States, to crush out the few remaining rights of the white race and to deliver over the States manacled to the Radical party. Pease having with unblushing impudence recommended that course to the convention in his message, Mr. Mullins said:

"Mr. President, I propose briefly to review the series of measures that have passed this body. In the first place, the Governor of the State sends in a message in which he recommends the disfranchisement of a 'sufficient' number of our citizens to place the political power of the State government in the hands of the 'loyal people,' meaning, of course, the Republican party. And for what are these men to be disfranchised? Is it for any crime they have committed? No such charge is made. It is not pretended that the masses of the white people of this State have committed any crime, unless it be a crime to belong to the Democratic or Conservative party. Why, then, disfranchise them? For the obvious purpose of placing an insignificant minority, claim: to be 'the simon pure' and truly loyal of the State, in power.

This convention, adopting the patriotic (?) suggestions of his excellency, proceeded to petition Congress to give them control of the boards of registrars. Why? Is it because the registration has not been fairly made? Not a bit of it; and yet the measure passed this House without a single item of testimony having been submitted to it going to show that fraud or corruption had been practiced by the boards of registration. Now, sir, it is impossible for any man in his proper senses to mistake the object of this move. It is to cut down the list of registration until a 'sufficient' number have been deprived of the privilege of voting to give the Republicans control."

"But this is not all. The black list is not yet complete; the truly loyal men yet sufficiently hedged in. But the prolific brain of the Republican party (so called) is equal to the emergency, and soon gives birth to the loyal-militia scheme. And what does this new-born prodigy of patriotism propose? Why, sir, forty thousand black men, just released from the manacles of slavery, and not yet emerged from the long night of ignorance and superstition in which their souls have been enveloped for centuries, are to be organized and armed for the express purpose of acting as a police force, to patrol the premises of their former masters, and, if needs be, control the coming elections. To justify all these measures and secure their sanction by the Congress of the United States, we have here a report on lawlessness and crime, which, at a glance, would shock the moral sense of mankind. And how was this report made? The records of the courts, and of the Freedmen's Bureau for the last three years have been searched, and every crime, every disorderly act, and every mean thing charged has been called therefrom, and brought to light for the purpose of branding the sixty thousand white people of this State as thieves, robbers, and murderers. Nine hundred homicides reported to have been committed in the last three years are here exposed, since it is taken for granted that every man charged is guilty. We are not told how many of these men were killed in self-defense, how many fell in drunken rows, how many were hung as horse thieves, or how many were murdered by robbers for their money; but they were all put down as cold-blooded murders, for which the Conservative party of the State is to be held responsible. Nay, you would fain have the world believe that all these victims were Union men, and fell as martyrs at the hands of men whom you style rebels because of their devotion to their Government.

"Sir, I should be unworthy of the high-toned, honorable, and law-abiding constituency whom I have the honor to represent on this floor, if I did not here in my place, brand this same report and the deductions drawn therefrom, as a foul slander on the white people of Texas. But to carry out these large plans, and put into immediate execution these wonderfully philanthropic schemers, it is proposed to send two gentlemen to Washington that they may enlighten Congress in regard to all the iniquitous deeds being perpetrated in Texas, and urge upon that body the immediate sanction and adoption of these measures. Now, sir, what is to be the result of all this, if your efforts succeed? It does not require the inspiration of a prophet, nor the wisdom of a seer to foresee it. The bitter enmities engendered by the late war, and which have been only partially buried, will again spring into life in full vigor. Malice and hatred, the legitimate parents of vice and crime, will again be aroused, and all their deadly fury. Wounds that have been partially healed by the plastic hand of time will again be opened afresh; midnight will again be made hideously luminous with the glare of the incendiary's brand and torch; consternation and death will stalk broadcast throughout the land; the earth will again be drenched in blood, and the wail of despair and grief that will go up from this devoted country will be sufficient to appal the ear of Heaven! Sir, I warn gentlemen against the adoption of this measure, if they would avoid plunging the country into utter ruin.

"They tell us, however, that they are in favor of 'equal rights before the law,' and yet they propose to whittle down the list of registration, and place a colored minority in power over the white majority."

"Let us have peace," you say, and yet you adopt the most certain means of bringing about a civil war, or an absolute military despotism.

"We are for economy," say you, and yet you indulge in the most extravagant expenditures for the advancement of your own partisan purposes.

"You invite immigration to the State, and yet you tell the world that the white men of Texas are thieves, robbers, and murderers, or their friends and allies. Do gentlemen desire that the lawless banditti of the world should come to Texas? If so, they are right in publishing this report, for it offers every inducement to that class of men to come. 'O consistency, thou art a Jew!'"

Surely these speeches make the aim and object of Radical leaders too plain for comment; and this is the bill they rely on and demand to enable them to carry out their nefarious purposes. As additional evidence of the falsehood of the charges made by these men in Texas of wholesale murders there as a pretext for the passage of this bill, I will next read the remonstrance of the Democratic delegation from Texas to the New York convention; gentlemen of the very highest position and respectability in the State, whose veracity will not be doubted by the country, though I suppose their statement will have but little weight on the other side of the House. I laid it before the committee and will read it here merely premising for the benefit of the other side that General Boughton and Judge Hancock at least were men of unquestioned loyalty from the beginning to the end of the war.

ROOMS OF THE TEXAS DELEGATION,
NEW YORK, July 9, 1868.

To the Senate and House of Representatives, United States of America:

It having come to the knowledge of the delegation from Texas to the national Democratic convention, just held in this city, that the State convention now in session at Austin, in the State of Texas, has deputed certain persons to represent to the Congress of the United States that an extraordinary state of lawlessness exists in said State, against loyal Union men by the late confederate partisans, and that the lives of loyal Union men and freedmen in different and most parts of said State are unsafe, &c. The said delegation do protest against the truth of the said representations, and have agreed that Hon. John Hancock and General Horace Boughton, original and unquestionable Union men of our State, be appointed by us to bear this our protest and statement to Washington, and there lay the same before the Congress, or a committee of Congress, to the end that just and true information be furnished on this subject.

And the said delegation does now here say and represent that the said representations of said conventional committee from Austin are unfounded and entirely wanting in truth.

That the members of our delegation are from all parts of the State, and their united and undivided testimony is that no such state of things exists in Texas as represented by the delegation from Austin, and that said representations are intended to influence, unduly, public opinion outside of Texas, prejudicial to the desire for peace on the part of our citizens, and their good faith in the maintenance of law and order.

That we are assured by persons from all parts of the State, including truly loyal citizens, that whatever degree of lawlessness prevails in Texas is the result of a disorganized state of society, consequent upon the inefficiency, disorganization, and transformation of the courts and juries, and is in no wise of a political character.

That we rely on the known and distinguished character of our deputies to contradict and counter-vail the representations in question, and by a fair and truthful statement to spare our people the ignominy of having placed over them an armed police; and especially in times like these, when such armed force would more than possibly be composed of zealous partisans, saying nothing of the already onerous financial condition of our State and country.

That as well might we collect the lists of crime in New York or any other large community, and set it down as an evidence of disloyalty and demoralization as to collect this data from the extended territory and sparsely settled regions of Texas and count it as an evidence of disloyalty on the part of our citizens.

We therefore respectfully submit that no weight should be given to the representations in question, and that no action should be had on the same.

Being requested, in conjunction with Judge Hancock, to present the above and foregoing statement by said delegation to the honorable Congress, I would in this connection beg leave to state that I was in the national Army from the commencement to the termination of the war, at the end of which I was a brevet brigadier general. In December, 1865, having been appointed assessor of internal revenue for the fourth collection district of Texas, and embracing a large portion of the territory of said State, and not less than one fourth of the entire population of the State, I at once organized my said office at Marshall, in Harrison county, giving employment to from twenty to thirty persons in the discharge of the duties of my office, and while the assessment of taxes on a people without representation is well calculated to arouse unpleasant feelings, and even resistance, I have encountered none, nor have I heard of any violence or even insult offered to any one of my employes, or to any other Federal officer, on account of their political sentiments, past or present.

HORACE BOUGHTON,
Assessor of the fourth district of Texas.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1868.

I am well acquainted in all the central and western parts of Texas, and fully indorse the foregoing statements as to those portions of the State.

Very respectfully submitted,

JOHN HANCOCK.

WASHINGTON, July 11, 1868.

These facts seem to me conclusive against this bill. There is the statement of Judge Evans, himself a Republican and a leading member of the convention, and, as I said, a friend of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. There is the statement of the Democratic delegation, of General Boughton and Judge Hancock, and in addition to all this, there stands the fact that the General of the Army and General Reynolds have absolute power to order as many troops there as they please, and to remove all the officers of the provisional government in the State and appoint others. There is the fact that General Reynolds, the present commander, is a Republican, and that Governor Pease himself is an ultra Radical Republican prepared to do anything necessary for success.

Mr. BOUTWELL. With the permission of the gentleman, I desire to have read the report of General Reynolds of the 4th of July, in regard to the condition of things in Texas.

Mr. BECK. You can do that after I am through. I know there are conflicting reports, and that letter was read to the committee by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

I admit, as I have already said, that there are outrages in Texas, and, as I said, there always have been. There are everywhere; in New York and Philadelphia, Boston and everywhere else. But what I was going to say is, that as things now exist the white men of Texas protest and this House ought to protest against the reconstruction laws of Congress being set aside and all power being conferred on the convention, headed by a few malignant partisans who are seeking this power for the purpose of crushing out opposition to them and establishing a little oligarchy in defiance of the will of the people of Texas, so as to secure to themselves place and power as Governors, Senators, and Representatives there and here, by fraud and force. Send your Army, nay, even your Freedmen's Bureau there, if you please; increase the power of your General if he has not enough; do everything to preserve the peace and prevent fraud in the elections, and I will stand by you. But in God's name do not trample the people of Texas in the dust under the heels of such a convention as that and under the feet of the armed negroes you propose to place as masters over the white men there. That is all I have to say upon that subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask this House, with the Virginia convention dissolved, with Governor Wells there, your own political partisan, with all the machinery necessary to secure to your party friends every advantage, and with a bill passed in this House authorizing the election to be held in August according to your own laws, why will you reassemble that convention? When those men come and say that all they ask is to deprive twenty-five thousand white men of the right to vote, although as much entitled to vote as they are, why will you set aside your laws and the orders of your commanders and allow that to be done? Why will you turn out the men who were elected in the State of Mississippi, and put in men who were not elected, if a provisional government has to be continued there? Why will you, in the face of the statement of Judge Evans and other members of the convention of Texas, place this power in the hands of Governor Pease, when he has announced that he only wants it so that he may disfranchise enough to give his party the control of the State? Why will you establish armed bands of negroes all over those States, and thus inaugurate a war of races, unless you are prepared to avow before the country, what you cannot well conceal, that you are determined to count the electoral votes of these States for General Grant, even if you have to disfranchise every white man in them in order to enable you to do it, and then raise your hands in holy horror and charge all men as revolutionists who assert that such things shall not be permitted?

Rather than see such a bill as this pass I would say send your white soldiers there in any numbers desired; only let them be men of your own race and color, compel the people to obey your laws if compulsion be necessary. If your commanders have not power enough give it to them; if appropriations are needed make them. None of your commanders have failed in severity. Some of them, especially Meade, in the case of the young men in Columbus falsely charged with the murder of Ashburn, has exhibited toward prisoners and witnesses a barbarity and brutality unparalleled in modern times; and after all his infamous atrocities the telegrams announce that he has dissolved his court-martial, the proof being too clear and overwhelming even for him to resist that these gentlemen were as innocent as he was, and that the head and front of their offending was that they were active leaders in the Democratic party.

I insist that when no complaints come from either Virginia or Mississippi, and the object of that from Texas is made so apparent, that you shall not embrace all these States in your bill and then go before the northern people and say you desire peace, law, order, and representative government, while you are yourselves nullifying the laws you have yourselves passed and crushing out the rights you yourselves have bestowed upon these very men, for the revolutionary and despotic purpose of coercing the votes of those States for your candidate for the Presidency.

I know, sir, that I am talking to men who are very little disposed to listen to anything I may say, and I have but little hope of influencing the action of the majority. Indeed, their past action in regard to those States show how little they are governed by either law or precedent. When the Electoral College bill passed and by the amendment here, the three States of North Carolina, Arkansas, and Florida, all then represented in Congress, were seized, at is were, by the throats, and partly by the votes of their Representatives, were placed on the same footing as the unreconstructed States in the casting of their electoral votes, subject to the will of Congress whether such votes shall be counted or not. I thought the Radical party were developing their revolutionary policy to the country in a way that they could neither justify nor maintain, and I think so still; yet they did it, and when the other morning, men claiming to be Representatives from Alabama were admitted to their seats, I struggled unsuccessfully to be heard, believing that I could demonstrate that by our own laws and conduct we had determined that they were not elected and were no more entitled to seats here than any other men that might be picked up in any other part of the country, yet it would have been of no avail; every Republican, when he voted to admit those men, knew that they were not only not elected, but a large majority of the members of this House had recorded their votes here to sustain that fact. The case of Alabama is too fresh and the facts too well recollected to need repetition. The laws required that a majority of all the registered voters should vote at the election for or against the constitution of Alabama, and if they failed to do so the constitution should be rejected, and if rejected, of course all elections held under and by virtue of it were null and void. That election was held early in February, and the only certificates these Representatives have bear date from and are based on that election. I caused one of them to be read to show that fact. This constitution was then rejected, as General Meade certified, as this House determined, and on motion of Mr. STEVENS referred the bill proposing her admission under it back to the committee. The act of March 11, allowing a majority of the votes cast to determine the question, used the words "hereafter in all elections held," &c., and was not retrospective; and when those who were anxious to get Alabama and her Representatives recognized again, pressed their claims before this House, in a bill reciting that a large majority of the votes cast had been cast for the constitution and the candidates for office under it, Judge SPALDING, of Ohio, offered a substitute for the bill, which was adopted March 29, 1868. The substitute and the action taken on it are as follows:

"That the constitution framed by the convention of Alabama, which was submitted for ratification by the people at an election commencing on the 4th day of February, 1868, is hereby declared to be the fundamental and organic law for a provisional government for the people of Alabama, so far as the same is not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the officers elected at said election shall, on the 1st day of May, 1868, qualify as provided in said constitution and the ordinances of said convention, and immediately thereafter enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor at any time after he shall have qualified and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office, may by proclamation convene the Legislature chosen at said election. The Legislature, when so convened, shall possess all the power conferred by said constitution, which may not be in conflict with the Constitution and laws of the United States. And the Legislature is hereby further empowered to submit said constitution to the qualified electors of Alabama for ratification at such time or times as it may designate. And said Legislature is also empowered, by a majority vote of each House, to submit the said constitution, as framed by the convention, with or without amendments proposed by the Legislature. And if amendments be proposed by the Legislature, they shall be voted upon separately, and not in connection with the constitution as it came from the convention.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever the people, by a majority vote of the qualified electors of Alabama, qualified under the act of Congress of March 23, 1867, to vote for delegates to frame a constitution, and actually voting upon such ratification, shall have ratified a constitution submitted as aforesaid, and the Legislature of the proposed State organization shall have adopted the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and known as article fourteen, the constitution of Alabama may be presented to Congress for its approval.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the district commanders shall furnish all necessary aid in enforcing this act, and the act of March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to provide for a more efficient government for the rebel States," and the acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof shall remain in full force in Alabama except as modified by this act, until Alabama shall be restored to representation in Congress.

"Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

"The yeas and nays were ordered.

"The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 54, not voting 58; as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Anderson, Delos B. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benjamin, Bromwell, Broomall, Churchill, Sidney Clarke, Coburn, Cook, Covode, Cullom, Dawes, Dixon, Dodge, Briggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Elliott, Ferriss, Ferry, Halsey, Hawkins, Hill, Hopkins, Hunter, Koons, Judd, Julian, Kelsey, Ketcham, Maynard, Laffin, William Lawrence, Loan, Loughridge, Maynard, McClurg, Mercur, Moore, Moorhead, Morrell, Mullins, Myers, Nunn, O'Neill, Orth, Poland, Shanks, Pomeroy, Price, Raun, Sawyer, Schofield, Twichell, Smith, Spaulding, Thaddeus Stevens, Taffe, Twichell, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, John T. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—77."

Every man who voted for that substitute solemnly declared that the constitution of Alabama had been rejected by the people, and that all elections at the time that vote was taken were null and void. The provisional legislature was authorized to again submit it, with or without amendments, to the people for ratification. The omnibus bill of June 23 merely declared that Alabama and the other States should be entitled and admitted to representation in Congress as States when their Legislatures did certain things; but it did not declare that the void election in February held in Alabama should be valid, or that an election to determine who should be her Representatives in Congress should not be held. Yet in the face of all these things this Congress selected a number of its own partisans and has sworn them in as Representatives from Alabama without giving that people any chance to say a word, and without even advising them of their intention to do so. Of course, these gentlemen now on this floor no more represent the people of Alabama than they represent the moon. They are the appointees of this Congress, no more, no less. After a Congress does things like that it is of course hopeless to seek to check the members of it who do them by any legal or constitutional objections to their course.

I merely desire to say in the minute or two left me, that as a member of the committee I was willing, and proposed, rather than see this bill pass, to make the power of the General of the Army absolute over these States for the time being. I know that public opinion and his own self-respect would compel him to treat their people as civilized men. My substitute was rejected, and they are now to be surrendered to the mercy of their bitterest and most relentless enemies, who, by the constabulary force herein provided for mercenary bands of negroes to be armed by the bill for that purpose now being pressed before the House, are to eat out their substance, drive them from the polls at the point of the bayonet, humiliate, degrade, insult, and disgrace the white men in every possible form so as to bring about collisions and riots, which of course will be charged all over the North to the rebellious spirit of the people who are wantonly murdering poor, innocent, unoffending Union men because of their devotion to the flag and the principles of the Radical party. That is the last hope for Radical success. Whether the people of the South can endure all the humiliations, to which they will be subjected as they have endured those they are now suffering is the only problem. If they can, your bill, in one of its leading objects, will be a failure.

I do not believe the committee desire or intend that it shall have effect. I cannot believe it. Their course, in frowning down the infamous propositions of Wells and Williamson, relative to Virginia, their insertion on my motion into this bill of the clause that candidates shall not be revising registrars nor judges of the election indicate that they do not; still that it will produce all the evils I have suggested, and will be carried out in total disregard and defiance of law by the parties it places in power, is as clear to my mind as the sun at noon-day.

If only protection and the due execution of the law is desired, surely conventions elected solely to frame constitutions, without reference to their executive ability are illy adapted to secure the desired end. Your armies, your military tribunals, your existing bureaus, and all your military machinery which now exists and can be indefinitely extended, are far more efficient. I see nothing but evil in the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, let me premise by saying that I am in favor of every provision of this bill. It is in the right direction—an attempt to restore civil government at the South by the laws and by the action of the Congress of the United States; and I am ready to pass any measure by which the reconstruction which we have so far carried out could be made effectual. I trust it may be, and yet I am oppressed by doubts; and it is with reference to those doubts that I desire to occupy a few moments to examine whether, upon the whole, we are now engaged upon a measure of practical value. I trust the bill may be passed by this House; I trust it may pass the Senate, that we may show our desire by our action to make every provision for the restoration of civil governments in some form over the southern States.

But, sir, I have no hope that this bill will become a law. We have agreed to adjourn on Monday, and whoever expects this bill to be signed by the President of the United States, or returned with his objections, so that we can pass it over them before Monday noon, has a faith which would fit him to believe the promise which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] said he had received from the President, that all the bills that passed would be signed, when he wished to carry the adjournment.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether we did not pass the resolution for adjournment upon the allegation of the gentleman from Illinois that the President would either sign or veto all our bills in time for an adjournment on Monday.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Massachusetts has, in referring to what I said, stated the matter rather broadly. What I said was this: that I had reliable information that the President would either sign or veto those political bills. The two bills to which I particularly referred were the bill in reference to vacancies in the Executive Departments, commonly called the ad interim bill, and the bill in regard to the Freedmen's Bureau. The ad interim bill has already been signed, and the bill in regard to the Freedmen's Bureau will, I understand, be signed or vetoed to-morrow.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the President has taken the gentleman from Illinois into his confidence. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has no right to speak of me in that way. I have not seen the President, and the gentleman, from what I said, has no right to make such a statement. I said I was reliably informed of a certain fact. I have not had any communication with the President.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Well, sir, the old Latin maxim is qui facit per alium facit per se; and if the gentleman gets his reliable information through a third person, why then we have two men who are liable to be mistaken instead of one. I hope the gentleman's communication may prove true. But I say again that I do not believe, and my friend from Illinois will pardon me for saying that I do not believe he believes, that the President will approve or return with his veto the bill now before us—the bill to which we were all looking for a finish to our reconstruction measures. I mean we who had some idea of the necessity of staying here. Now, sir, let us see exactly where we stand in relation to reconstruction. Let us see what the President of the United States has told us. Lest I do him injustice I will read his own words from his recent message vetoing the Electoral College resolution :

"It is worthy of remark that if the States whose inhabitants were recently in rebellion were legally and constitutionally organized and restored to their rights prior to the 4th of March, 1867, as I am satisfied they were, the only legitimate authority under which the election for President and Vice President can be held therein must be derived from the governments instituted before that period.

"It clearly follows that all State governments organized in those States under acts of Congress for that purpose and under military control are illegitimate and of no validity whatever; and, in that view, the votes cast in those States for President and Vice President, in pursuance of acts passed since the 4th of March, 1867, and in obedience to the so-called reconstruction acts of Congress, cannot be legally received and counted; while the only votes in those States that can be legally cast and counted will be those cast in pursuance of the laws in force in the several States prior to the legislation by Congress upon the subject of reconstruction."

There you have it, sir, broad and full. The Chief Executive of the United States holds all your actions in this direction "illegal, illegitimate, of no validity, and void." He sends us that notice, and yet do we propose to sit here to pass bills to be sent to him which, when they become laws, he considers illegal, illegitimate and void. He gives you fair notice that no electoral votes can be cast or counted in those States except under the governments organized by himself; not one under the governments organized by you. And he holds the governments organized under acts of Congress, States organized under constitutions submitted to the people thereof and ratified, under which we have forty-odd members sitting here, and twelve Senators in the other House, are all null and void; that our fellow members are illegally here, and the Senators are illegally there, and, in the language of one of his supporters, ought to be expelled. Why, then, shall we sit here enacting provisional governments under the reconstruction acts, or any other acts, when the President announces, in the most solemn form, that all the obligations of law we pass are to be treated by him as of no effect, null and void.

In order to show you what we are to expect from these States, he tells you, if we go on, that every vote cast under governments instituted by you will not be counted, and every vote cast by governments instituted by him will be counted. I remarked yesterday incidentally that I did not desire to go into a heads-I-win-and-tails-you-lose sort of an election. What I desired to express was that if we carry the southern States then the votes are not to be counted. If we lose the southern States then we are estopped from objecting that they be counted against us. So we are to go into an election with seventy electoral votes which are to go against us in any event. If we lose them we cannot object to their being counted against us. If we win them the President tells us they shall be counted against us.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I decline. I would be glad to yield if I had the time.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. You can have the time if you want it. You have omnipotent power.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I call the attention of the House to another difficulty which we are to meet leaving our seats to go home, and I will take the text from my own home organ, the New York World. [Laughter.] It devotes an equal portion of its columns to abuse of me and to praise of Seymour, and so I insist that it is my home organ. The World tells us for once, and I agree with it in the first part of the sentence :

"If Congress will adjourn and leave things as they stand, every southern State can be carried for the Democratic ticket, and if Congress should prevent the counting of the votes, the superiority of numbers demonstrated at the polls will constitute a preponderance of physical strength against which it will be vain to contend."

Here, then, is the organ of Mr. Seymour, his mouthpiece, the paper that did more to nominate him, and will by its praises do less to elect him than any other, and it tells you exactly in so many words that if we adjourn with matters as they stand now the South will be carried against us. Again we are warned that force is to be used, if what the World denominates their votes are not counted; that is to say, if the white rebel voters who are disfranchised and who vote under the President's State governments are not counted against us although the whole legitimate vote may be given for us.

This, then, brings us to a question of force. Our friends, the true loyal men of the South, are unarmed, I believe, and we know they cannot contend against the armed rebel element there without arms. The rebellion cost us two million muskets, and four years to put it down, and yet our friends down there are asked to beat down the same element with their naked arms. And in the face of this we are told we must not send any arms there. Why not? Because we shall "irritate" somebody. Sir, we have fought such irritation for five years.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman is not discussing the bill before the House. He is short of time and is discussing some other question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. DAWES in the chair.) The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I supposed he would. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Therefore I say this bill is not a remedy for the evils of the South, and therefore I am in order. But the editor of the World does not stop here. He says:

"If they refuse to count our votes at the polling-places, we have arithmetic enough to count our own sinewy arms."

Now, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, you are forewarned. You are told by the President that he holds these State governments are illegal and their votes cannot be counted. The Democratic candidate for the Presidency holds that they are illegal and revolutionary. Their candidate for the Vice Presidency not only holds them to be illegal, but that the President should sweep them out of existence by the Army of the United States. If the assumption of the President is true as contained in his veto of the Electoral College bill, then it logically follows, and I agree to it, it is the duty of the President to take the Army of the United States and sweep away those State governments. There is no escape from that conclusion. He holds all these governments are illegal and void, against the Constitution and against the will of the people, and holding that view it is his duty as the Executive, whose duty it is to see that the laws are faithfully executed, to put down by the power of the Army of the United States those insurrectionary governments, as according to his doctrines they plainly are. He adopts, therefore, the Democratic theory that they should be overturned by force, and we are doing what? Making provisional governments for these States which are declared to be insurrectionary, and are so if the President is correct, which are mere secession governments, disturbers of the peace, and in rebellion against the General Government.

I say, therefore, we are simply wasting our time in passing this bill. We have but one duty, in my judgment, to perform. Either we are right or we are wrong. If we are right, if our governments are legal, if our reconstruction measures are to stand, we ought to protect them. We ought to protect our action, our legislation, ourselves, and our honor. How is this to be done?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. PAINE. I wish to reply very briefly to some statements of my colleague on the committee [Mr. BECK] respecting the regularity of the election in the State of Mississippi. Now, I admit that General Gillem in general terms in his report concludes that there was a tolerable condition of regularity and order in the election in that State. But, sir, in opposition to his statement I will offer here, so far as my time will allow, extracts from reports made by his subordinate officers showing what the facts are, and upon what reports General Gillem assumes to inform the General and the country that in his opinion there were no serious irregularities or disorders in that State.

And here let me remind the gentleman from Kentucky that he is mistaken in his assertion that the General of the Army has it in his power to remove and appoint district commanders. The General of the Army has some powers under the reconstruction acts but the President alone has power to remove or appoint district commanders, to place General Gillem or any other officer in command in the district.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to refer to the reconstruction act of July, 1867, which gives the General of the Army that power absolutely :

"SEC. 2. That the commander of any district named in said act shall have power, subject to the disapproval of the General of the Army of the United States, and to have effect till disapproved, whenever in the opinion of such commander the proper administration of said act shall require it, to suspend or remove from office, or from the performance of official duties and the exercise of official powers, any officer or person holding or exercising, or professing to hold or exercise, any civil or military office or duty in such district under any power, election, appointment, or authority derived from, or granted by, or claimed under, any so-called State or the government thereof, or any municipal or other division thereof; and upon such suspension or removal such commander, subject to the disapproval of the General as aforesaid, shall have power to provide from time to time for the performance of said duties of such officer or person so suspended or removed, by the detail of some competent officer or soldier of the Army, or by the appointment of some other person, to perform the same, and to fill vacancies occasioned by death, resignation, or otherwise.

"SEC. 3. That the General of the Army of the United States shall be invested with all the powers of suspension, removal, appointment, and detail granted in the preceding section to district commanders.

"SEC. 4. That the acts of the officers of the Army already done in removing in said districts persons exercising the functions of civil officers, and appointing others in their stead, are hereby confirmed: Provided, That any person heretofore or hereafter appointed by any district commander to exercise the functions of any civil office may be removed either by the military officer in command of the district or by the General of the Army."

Mr. PAINE. That is the power to suspend subordinate officers, not to appoint or remove district commanders.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky, for I think it important that the House should understand this matter, whether he claims by anything that he has said in this interruption, that under existing law the General of the Army has power to remove the commanding officers of any of these military districts, and I demand of him now what section of what law confers that power?

Mr. BECK. I say that the General of the Army has a right to remove any or all of the provisional officers, from the governor down, and that is what you are providing against in your bill, one of the leading features of it.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will pardon me, I beg leave to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, that he totally mistakes the scope of the bill. It does not affect the question of the appointment of the commanding officers of these military districts at all, but subjects them to the operations of this law, and the General of the Army never had any more power over them than has the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. But the General of the Army had power to remove the provisional governors and every officer of these States, and has it now.

Mr. PAINE. What the gentleman from Kentucky said was this: that the General of the Army had power to remove and appoint the district commanders, and what I denied was that assertion. I will spend no more time upon that point, but I will read a few extracts from the reports made by subordinate officers of General Gillem respecting the election in Mississippi. I regret that I have not time to read more. I will begin with the report made by Thomas H. Norton, brevet major United States Army, and one of the inspectors of elections. He says:

"There is not a political meeting held in which the newly enfranchised freedmen are not solemnly warned and threatened that if they do not vote down the proposed constitution they will be deprived of employment, and that the southern whites will see their lands confiscated rather than permit these freedmen who oppose them politically to earn a livelihood by their cultivation. Not only are these unlawful threats used in the speeches of these politicians, but many prominent newspapers throughout the State in the interests of their party publish conspicuous editorials approving and pledging themselves and others to the enforcement of this barbarous policy of outrage and persecution. In consequence of this system of intimidation, I am fully persuaded that hundreds, and perhaps thousands of legal voters will be prevented from approaching the polls to give a free expression to their political preferences.

"Again, the laws of the United States prohibit any civil or military officer of any State government now in process of reconstruction from using their official influence in any way to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct the due and proper administration of the acts of Congress relating to reconstruction, or any act supplementary thereto, and a specific punishment is prescribed for infractions of those laws.

"Now, it is respectfully submitted and can be substantiated that the official influence of nearly all the civil officers of the State of Mississippi has been and is now constantly exercised to hinder and prevent the reconstruction of the State in violation of the true intent and meaning of the laws above referred to. The Governor of Mississippi is now actively canvassing the State in opposition to reconstruction, when, in view of the extraordinary excitement now pervading the entire community, every obligation of official decorum and every consideration of public safety would seem to demand that in the legitimate discharge of his functions as the chief executive of the State he should be at his post using every means at his command to enforce the laws and in aiding the military commander in the maintenance of public order and in preserving the peace and dignity of the community."

I now read from a report signed by William Atwood, first lieutenant nineteenth infantry, one of the inspectors of election. He says:

"As the last one (a colored man) left the polls, a white man asked him how he had voted. He intimated he had voted the Radical ticket, whereupon the white man struck him a blow with a stick, telling him to 'go along.' The negro started to run and fell at the edge of the yard. Another white man made an attack upon him while down, but was so much intoxicated as to be unable to injure him. He arose and ran down the road, and while running was struck by still another white man, and knocked down," &c.

E. C. Gilbraith, first lieutenant twenty-fourth United States infantry, an inspector of election, says:

"Many complaints are made by persons who have been discharged from employment for voting as they did. I am convinced that the election was no free expression of opinion, and was carried through pressure."

John E. Meek, states as follows:

"Being one of the registrars of the county of Monroe, Mississippi, I must say to you that the feeling of a large portion of the people in this county is anything else but loyal. In the district in which I held the election, many of the voters were deterred from voting for the constitution and went home. It was proclaimed by rebels publicly that they wanted to see and know the white man that dared to come up to the polls and vote the Radical ticket. So if the constitution is defeated it will be done in that way, by forcing public opinion and making a man odious who wishes to vote with the Republican party.

"I have no doubt that in order to reconstruct the State you will be compelled to remove all of the civil officers of the State, and to cast off the official influences that are wielded over the people of this county and State. All the sheriffs and clerks here took a bold stand to defeat ratification. Not one of them can qualify for office under the present military rule. The registrars of this county know all and every man in the county who are competent to fill the various offices and who can take the oath of office. So whenever the time comes to displace them you can have the reference of qualification through this board of registrars as to merit and qualification.

The excitement here to-day is as angry as in the year 1860. They are as defiant to the Government as ever, notwithstanding their denial to the contrary. They boast that if a collision of arms should take place at the polls to-morrow they could whip out the Federals before they could get aid from headquarters.

"You need not be surprised to hear of a collision of arms at any moment. Radicals are not safe to travel the public highways of the county, notwithstanding the rebel papers at this day tell you that good order prevails over the State; it is done for a blind to keep all right at headquarters.

"In giving you this hint of what is brewing here, it is done from the best of motives of a loyal man. You may think it premature with me, but I am a close observer of the political events of the day. I would be pleased to hear from you at any time."

F. P. Hilliard makes the following statement:

"I have the honor to state that I came here to-night for the purpose of asking for instructions. I closed the election at Lassel's shop precinct this evening at seven o'clock; many freedmen came there to vote and went away without voting.

"Threats and intimidation are used; parties opposed to reconstruction insist upon remaining about the polls as challengers, and take the names of all parties voting, and inquire very particularly how every man votes. The voters are watched so closely that many of them say they cannot vote as they wish to. They are informed by people away from the polls that these men are taking their names, and are finding out how they vote; telling them that if they do not vote as they wish them to that they (the freedmen) will regret it; that labor will not be given them, any more provisions will not be issued them, &c. My opinion is that an honest expression of the wishes of the voters cannot be had unless we can rule away from the polls all except the sheriff and commissioners of election.

"Please inform me by telegram to Yazoo City, and I will get it in time for the election at Benton."

General Gillem, it is true, uses in his report the following general language:

"As is generally the case in elections frauds is charged by both parties. All reports and complaints bearing on this subject are herewith transmitted for the consideration of the proper authority. (See Appendix C.) Merely remarking that I am satisfied the election was as fair and free from intimidation or the influence of fraud as it would be possible to secure under existing circumstances, and that no undue influence was exercised at the polls. If intimidation was used at all it was beyond the power of the military to reach it."

But, sir, in these very documents which accompany his report, General Gillem, who finds no serious irregularities in that election, furnishes proof that statements and complaints were actually made to him, that irregularities had been perpetrated, and the grossest wrongs had been committed on the freedmen. I will not detain the House by reading any further extracts, as I presume they are familiar to my friends on the other side.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Will my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] yield to me to offer an amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I move to amend the bill by adding to it the following:

And be it further enacted, That if in any one of said States any person shall, during the year 1868, vote for any candidate for elector for President or Vice President of the United States, or shall act as an officer at any election for such candidate, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be liable to indictment and conviction therefor in any court of competent jurisdiction, and shall, on such conviction, be fined not more than $1,000, and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year.

And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to prohibit any person from voting or acting as an officer at any election contrary to the provisions of this act; and for that purpose he shall employ the power of the Army and Navy of the United States, so far as may be necessary.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Colonel WILLIAM G. MOORE, his Secretary, informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 554) making a grant of land to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river;

An act (H. R. No. 698) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1869;

An act (H. R. No. 761) to construct a wagon-road from West Point to Cornwall Landing, all in the county of Orange, State of New York;

An act (H. R. No. 1227) granting a pension to Martha Ann Wallace;

An act (H. R. No. 1820) for the relief of L. Merchant & Co. and Peter Rosecranz;

An act (H. R. No. 1337) granting an increase of pension to Frances S. Richardson, widow of the late Major General Israel B. Richardson;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 329) to amend the fourteenth section of the act approved July 28, 1866, entitled "An act to protect the revenue, and for other purposes;"

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 340) for the relief of Peter M. Carmichael, surgeon of the port of Albany;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 343) to admit free of duty certain statutory;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the "Washington Target-Shooting Association," in the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 354) admitting steam plows free of duty for one year from June 30, 1868.

ENROLLED BILLS, ETC., SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 433) authorizing the trustees of Union Chapel of the Methodist Episcopal church, in the city of Washington, to mortgage their property for church purposes;

An act (S. No. 509) in addition to an act passed March 28, 1864, entitled "An act in addition to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States';"

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) granting permission to officers and soldiers to wear the badge of the corps in which they served during the rebellion; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 121) to carry into effect the resolution approved March 2, 1867, providing for the exchange of certain public documents.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. No. 162) to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed House bill of the following title, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 1275) relating to the Alexandria canal.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

THE SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the bill to provide for the more speedy reorganization of the States of Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas, and for other purposes. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] has five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. COVODE obtained leave to print some remarks as part of the debates. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, in the five minutes left me, I can do no more than refer to a single objection made by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Beck.] He has intimated to the House, indeed he has stated to the House in terms which I think he did not fully consider, that by this bill persons authorized and entitled to be registered under the existing laws of Congress would be deprived of the privilege of registering, and consequently of the privilege of voting. I beg leave to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, and I say it under my responsibility to the people whom I represent, that there is nothing in the bill before the House that can be tortured by human ingenuity into any such construction. On the contrary, (and it is due to the gentleman from Kentucky that I should say it,) the committee have, by way of caution, inserted in this bill language providing that the officers appointed in the mode specified in the bill shall observe in all respects the provisions of the existing laws touching the matter of reconstruction. Hence it results that officers appointed as provided in this bill will have no more power to deprive any person in either of the States named of registration or of the right to vote than have the existing officers.

The only difficulty in the case, Mr. Speaker, (and it is this that gives occasion for this legislation,) is that we have an apostate President, who has no more care touching the execution of the laws of this country than has the king of Dahomey. We desire, therefore, so to amend the laws as to aid their execution by the united action of the people of these States, represented in their constitutional conventions. Gentlemen have intimated here some doubts about the constitutionality of this legislation. I beg leave to say to the gentlemen who have made this objection that the very men who constituted the uniting link between the men who made the Government and the men who executed the Government thereafter, did in more than one instance, as gentlemen will find by reference to the early legislation of Congress, exercise these same general powers which have never been challenged until this day, when they are challenged in the interest of partisans and of party, though they are invoked for the establishment of law and order in the disorganized territories of this country. I have said this much by way of answer to my colleague on the committee. Our existing laws, instead of being changed in this behalf, are reiterated and are to be enforced, but through a different agency. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. WOOD. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Two undebatable propositions now pending prevent that motion from being in order. If it had been made before the demand for the previous question, it would have been in order.

Mr. WOOD. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion of Mr. WOOD was not agreed to, there being—yeas 19, noes not counted.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment of Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Before this bill is passed my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] desires to be heard for ten minutes, and I am willing to yield to him.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTFIELD] is now in order. If the debate continues the gentleman has the right to take any member from the floor by a motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Under what rule?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"After one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees and resolutions, it shall be in order, pending the consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Read beyond that.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It is an invariable practice, too, to permit a member, upon the expiration of the morning hour, to take the floor, even though another may be occupying it, to make the motion to proceed to business on the Speaker's table."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. My point of order is that that refers to the standing committees of the House making their reports in the morning hour, and not to the reports of special committees like the Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The rule is, that after one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees and resolutions, it shall be in order, pending the consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table. It does not speak of standing committees or special committees. The committees of the House are divided into two classes. One called in regular order is entitled to two morning hours, and no more, until called again in regular order. The other class, of which the Committee of Elections and the Committee on Reconstruction may be regarded as types, can report at any time. Its business is regarded of a higher character. At the end of the hour, when the Committee of Claims is making reports, a motion to go, to the business upon the Speaker's table is in order, and the Chair does not see why it should not be in order after an hour has been devoted to the consideration of reports from the Committee on Reconstruction. The rule is broad, and covers all committees.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. If the vote be taken without debate I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to delay the House about this matter myself, but I deemed it my duty to yield a few minutes to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only ask to read the following extract from General Reynold's letter:

"In addition to all that I have heretofore stated with regard to the necessity of military commissions in Texas, I beg now to add that my experience and additional information with reference to the amount of lawlessness throughout the State fully confirm my previous statements, and compel me to repeat the application. Scarcely a day passes that I am not appealed to for a military commission."

"These appeals, although coming in a majority of instances from men of well known Union sentiments, are by no means confined to men of any party. Conservatives, Radicals, whites and blacks, profess an earnest desire to have a stop put to the murdering which is going on in the State to an extent which is almost incredible to citizens of other States, and which is a disgrace to the civilization of the age."

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. RAUM then addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 27, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beatty, Benton, Bingham, Blackburn, Boies, Boutwell, Bowen, Brownell, Broomall, Buckland, Buckley, Calkins, Churchill, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Coburn, Corvode, Cullom, Delano, Dewesse, Dixon, Dockery, Driggs, Eckley, Ela, Eliot, Ferriss, Fields, French, Garfield, Gravelly, Halsey, Hamilton, Hanthey, Heaton, Higby, Hill, Hinds, Hooper, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Alexander H. Van Horn, Vanz Trump, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, James F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Woodward—77.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

FUNDING BILL.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the resumption of the consideration of the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, which had been passed over until a quorum should be present.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the House insist upon its amendments and ask for a committee of conference. It is important that we should endeavor to come to an agreement.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Messrs. SCHENCK, LOGAN, and BOUTWELL.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BROOMALL. I rise to make the following privileged report:

Report of the Committee on Accounts upon the resolution of July 15, 1868, directing them to investigate into the disbursements of the contingent funds of the House for 1867 and 1868.

The Committee on Accounts, who were directed by a resolution of the House July 15, 1868, to inquire into and report the disbursement of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives for the years 1867 and 1868, make report:

These tables are taken from the records of the clerks, and as the accounts of the clerks up to a very recent date have been passed upon and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury Department, the tables may be relied upon for years prior to 1868 as absolutely correct, and for the year 1868 as equally so, subject to whatever error may be discovered in the accounts not yet reached. This element of uncertainty for the year 1868 must be very small, since among the thousands of accounts sent annually to the Treasury Department for revision the discovery of any error whatever is of rare occurrence.

These tables would seem to constitute a full compliance with the order of the House, and the committee might leave the subject here, but for some matters which came to their knowledge during the investigation, and which being connected with the subject-matter the committee deem proper to be presented to the House.

It came to the knowledge of the committee that one W. J. Manker, who had been in the Doorkeeper's department knew, or professed to know, some violations of law in the disbursement of the contingent fund. The committee accordingly summoned and examined Mr. Manker, and his testimony, with that of some other witnesses, accompanies this report. It appears from the testimony of Mr. Manker that he held the position of messenger under the Doorkeeper from about March 4, 1867, to July 1, instant. That about the commencement of the present session he had some disagreement with Mr. Edward Spicer, superintendent of the folding-room, about some money, $150, which the witness alleged to be due him, the particulars of which will appear in a subsequent part of this report.

Being unable to get the money, Mr. Manker, as he tells us, set about to discover irregularities in the management of the Doorkeeper's department. He believed there were frauds there, and he confesses his intention was to possess himself of sufficient facts to put the Doorkeeper in his power, and thereby compel him to pay the money.

Mr. Manker's investigations were conducted with profound secrecy, and continued from early in last winter up to about the last of June. His success in the Doorkeeper's department stimulated him to further inquiries, and he attacked the departments of the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, and postmaster, in all of which he discovered, or thought he discovered, gigantic iniquities. The result of this investigation appears in a printed pamphlet of thirty-eight pages which he produced before the committee, and a copy of which accompanies this report.

According to his own testimony, when he had prepared himself with what he deemed the evidence of fraud contained in the book, he communicated with several of the Republican Representatives from his own State, Indiana, and the result was that some time in the present month an interview took place between himself and Mr. HUNTER, Messrs. COBURN and SHANKS being present. He seems to have impressed these gentlemen with the opinion that he had been injured, and according to his account of the interview they were disposed to see him righted if that would end his quarrel with the Doorkeeper and reconcile him to Mr. COBURN, at whose instance he was first appointed, and whom he accused of neglecting his complaints. He says his investigations and book cost him $200, and that he asked $350 to suppress the book. One of the gentlemen remarked that the transaction looked like black-mailing, whereupon the witness became greatly incensed and refused to treat further.

It is proper to state that Messrs. HUNTER, COBURN, and SHANKS, in their testimony, deny all intention and all propositions to purchase the book, their object being simply to befriend Mr. Manker and end his quarrel. Before this interview, according to his testimony, he had opened negotiations with the national Democratic committee, through Mr. NIMBLECK, a Democratic Representative from his own State, and soon afterward succeeded in selling his book to that committee to be used as a campaign document for consideration which, to use his own language, "was better to him than to remain in the Doorkeeper's department and receive a year's salary." That salary, he tells us, is $1,440.

It is proper to state that Mr. Manker tells us the book is to be modified to some extent in the hands of the Democratic committee, but he left the impression that the proposed modifications were not important. The book, as reported, may therefore be considered substantially as it will be given to the world. It bears upon its title-page the inviting announcement, "The Ventilation of the Radical House of Representatives, showing the most infamous system of swindling that can be found in this or any other country."

As the misrepresentations are gross, and as some of them may be believed by the country, the committee have deemed it proper to examine and report from undoubted official sources the facts so attempted to be perverted. The committee owe an apology to the House for noticing such a publication. A book gotten up for the purpose of frightening the Republicans into the payment of money to suppress it, or in default of that to sell it to the Democrats for use in the coming campaign, might be well expected to be made to answer its twofold purpose if the writer had sufficient ingenuity to do it, but where the truth can be so readily got at it is well that the House and the country should be put in possession of it.

The committee find the table on pages 4 and 5, showing the expenses of the House for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1864, 1865, 1866, 1867, and 1868, more nearly correct than anything else in the book, but it duplicates the item of $100,000.

This was additional compensation to employes voted in 1863, and is embraced within the amounts ascribed to the years following that date.

Hence this sum has no business in the table. The actual expenses of these various years appear on the books of the Clerk's office, and are as follows:

In the year ending June 30:
1864.....	$328,384 26
1865.....	481,884 00
1866.....	462,418 96
1867.....	464,810 98
1868.....	685,281 28
	$2,522,679 48

The figures in the book for 1863, the witness admits in his testimony, were partially estimated. This accounts for their being $40,000 too much. The trifling aggregate error in Mr. Manker's table of $140,000 may not lessen the value of the book in the estimation of the purchasers, but it is worth noticing. The increase of 1863 over 1864 is accounted for by the twenty per cent. increase of compensation of officers, clerks, and employes, by the enlargement of the Capitol police, by the increased size and expense of the Globe, growing out of the frequent and long sessions of Congress, by the creation of additional committees, and the increase of committee clerks, consequent upon the enormous increase of legislative business, by the number of investigating committees, and contested seats, by the repair and refurnishing of the various rooms in the Capitol, all of which was neglected during the war, and by the general increase of documents, the additional allowances for and consumption of stationery and newspapers, consequent upon the repeated convenings of Congress.

These expenses were necessarily incidental to the enforced antagonistic position of the legislative body toward the Executive, and they could not have been avoided without infidelity to the highest duties. In the stationery statement (page 6) there are serious mistakes. The table giving the stationery for 1863—which must have been meant for 1867, for that of 1868 cannot be ascertained until the end of the year—states it at $7,500, and the commutation of stationery at $22,150 is added by Manker, making a total of $99,650. The stationery for 1864 is placed at $36,600, and the commutation $2,000, making a total of $38,600.

This, according to Manker, shows an excess for 1867, over 1864 of $61,050.

The books of the disbursing officer of the Clerk's office show the entire expenditure under each appropriation in each year. From them we get the entire amount of stationery and commutation drawn by members for the years named as follows:

	Total amount paid both for stationery and commutation.	Amount of commutation allowed.
For 1864.....	$24,312 85	$4,633 74
For 1865.....	20,263 97	2,927 43
For 1866.....	34,382 05	9,264 40
For 1867.....	56,484 63	18,994 26
For 1868 (six months).....	15,721 02	3,081 83

From this we find that the whole amount of stationery and commutation for 1867 was $55,484 63, instead of $99,650, as alleged in the book, and that the increase over 1864 was $31,171 78, instead of $61,050, as alleged by Mr. Manker. It must be borne in mind that in 1867 there were three distinct sessions of Congress, and therefore three allowances of stationery to members, whereas in 1864 there was but one session and but one allowance. Most of the actual excess was owing to this fact.

These official facts entirely destroy the assertions of the book, and make ridiculous its attempts to account for imaginary excesses by imagining every form of extravagance. The difference between the facts and the book is, doubtless, owing to the circumstance that the latter was made to sell and the former not. The stationery alone without the commutation for 1864, was $19,679 11, and that for 1867, $36,490 37. Out of this latter sum the members were supplied upon their orders, the various officers of the Clerk's department, that of the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Doorkeeper, and postmaster were supplied. The wrapping-paper for folding hundreds of thousands of documents for distribution among the people was furnished and a surplus left over of $8,914 92 with which to begin the year 1868. On page 11 it is alleged that the purchases of stationery for 1867 amounted to $85,000, and the commutation for stationery drawn by members $20,000, making a total of $105,000, whereas the fact is, and the records of the House show it, that the entire purchases of stationery for that year were but $36,490 37, and the commutation $18,994 16, making a total of $55,484 63, a little over half the alleged figures.

When we consider the discrepancy between the facts and the allegation it is plain that some ingenuity must have been exercised to render the book valuable in the market for which it was intended.

On page 21 a comparison is instituted between 1868 and 1864, in the matter of horses and carriage hire and cartage, by which there is assigned to 1868 the sum of $14,213, and to 1864 $6,594, making an increase in the four years of $7,619. A reference to the Clerk's books shows that the following sums were expended for horses and carriage hire and cartage during the following years:

1863.....	$8,419 00
1864.....	9,583 50
1865.....	10,723 75
1866.....	10,308 50
1867.....	12,732 50
1868 (six months of).....	2,968 25

It will be seen that the book gives the alleged expenses for the years ending June 30, 1864 and 1868, respectively, while the records of the Clerk's office give us the expenditure during each year from January 1 to December 31. Hence an exact comparison cannot be instituted, but the figures in the table enable us to say with certainty that those in the book are false.

In these several sums are included the allowances for keeping horses for the public service by the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper. The number of these horses has been steadily the same for more than eight years, so that the expense could not greatly increase since 1864. On one occasion since that date the allowance for this particular was increased in consequence of the increased cost of keeping horses. The actual difference between 1864 and 1868 is thus accounted for.

On page 24 of the book appears a table, the contents of which are worthy the attention of authors who get up statistics at will to prove what they desire. It professes to give the expense of furnishing horses, carriages, cartage, &c., to the various officers of the House with incidental expenses for the year ending June 30, 1865, making the total $34,633. Among the items appears one for forage for horses ("estimated,") $15,000. As this forage is purchased by the officers and paid for by them out of the allowance made to them, (heretofore alluded to,) it is difficult to see why that sum figures in the expenses of the House. But supposing this estimate of the cost of forage to be correct, $15,000, and his statement of the allowance made to officers in the whole business to be as he states it, $14,213, the keeping of horses for the transaction of public business would not seem to be very profitable since the cost of keeping them exceeds by $787 per annum the entire sum allowed the officers for horses, carriage hire, and cartage. In a succeeding table on the same page a like ingenuity is exhibited. The Chief Clerk is alleged to have received $2,523 allowance for three horses and carriages, to which is added $3,750 for forage, under the false assumption that this is paid for by the Government. If the cost of keeping these horses to Mr. Lloyd is really $3,750 per annum, he will hardly get rich out of $2,523 allowed him by the House for keeping them.

The same remarks will apply to the item of $5,000 in the table on page 23, in the alleged expenses of the Postmaster's department. In addition to that there must become other serious blunder in the table. It makes the cost of the mail service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, including the salary of the Postmaster and his subordinates, $32,358 50; whereas the entire appropriation for that year for the whole matter was but $12,730 50.

The charges made in the book against the Sergeant-at-Arms consist almost altogether of those investigated by the committee in the early part of this session, and the report in that case is referred to as a full answer to them. It is sufficient to say, in short, that after full investigation the committee ascertained the amounts awarded him since the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to be in strict accordance with law and precedent.

Taking a single case complained of by Manker—that of the New Orleans investigation—the Sergeant-at-Arms is charged truly with having received $2,392 40 for summoning three hundred and one witnesses—this is $7 94 each. During the last Democratic Congress, the Thirty-Fifth, the Sergeant-at-Arms charged and received in the Fort Snelling investigation $4,408 for summoning forty-eight witnesses, making $190 17 each. Other comparisons between 1867 and 1868, show similar results. The parties who have purchased the book will hardly profit by contrasting the Thirty-Fifth and Thirty-Ninth Congresses.

The charge against the Clerk of having a person on his roll who was never in Washington has about as little real truth in it as the other principal charges in the book. No such person has been upon the roll since this committee was organized. It is said that some time in 1867, during the recess, the Clerk being at his home, and having his business correspondence, which is large, sent there, procured assistance there instead of taking it from Washington. This was approved by the Committee of Accounts, and as no additional expense to the Government was thereby incurred we see no reason to complain of it now.

The case of Anna E. Ward, complained of in the book, was examined by the Committee on Accounts some time since. She is the widow of a soldier who held the office until his death; his widow was left destitute and was appointed to succeed him. She procures the services to be performed by another person who draws no pay from the Government. This is not strictly regular, but the Government is not the loser. The services are performed, and the salary is paid; and it is an unfeeling act to strike at the pittance of a soldier's widow. If the House wants her discharged, it must not ask the committee to make the order.

There seems to be no specific charge against the Doorkeeper, except the refusal to pay Mr. Manker his full salary while absent from his post. This is treated elsewhere.

The charge that the Postmaster is interested in the contract for cartage made by himself is proven to be wholly without foundation. S. H. Dunham, so far from being a myth, is a citizen of the State of New York, who becoming tired of his contract left Washington, after bargaining with other parties to carry it out.

The charge that these officers are keeping their horses at the public expense is untrue. No charge for forage for horses appears anywhere against the Government.

The controversy between the witness Manker and the Doorkeeper, according to his own testimony, is this: about the adjournment of the March session of the Fortieth Congress a resolution was passed directing the Doorkeeper to retain his assistants and employes upon the roll. There were services to be performed which would require some time, and an adjourned session was to be held in July following. After the adjournment the witness desired to be absent during the recess. He was told by Mr. Spicer that he could do so upon paying out of his salary such sum as would be necessary to procure a substitute. He assented to this, and remained away from that time until November, except during the July session. His entire period of absence was about six months. During this time he received his full pay, a little over seven hundred dollars, though he performed no services whatever, and paid Mr. Spicer out of it $150 for procuring a substitute. He further states that on his return to Washington, in November, he discovered that no substitute had ever been employed, and he demanded of Mr. Spicer the money he had paid. He also states that there were fourteen subordinates of the Doorkeeper besides himself who obtained leave of absence under a similar arrangement, and that the aggregate amount paid to Mr. Spicer, including his own, was $1,950.

The testimony of Mr. Spicer admits the receipt of that amount of money, and alleges it to have been all paid over by him in good faith to substitutes procured for the absent parties.

A practice such as this the committee conceive to be liable to great abuses, and they recommend its entire discontinuance. As the Doorkeeper himself concurs in this opinion it will be unnecessary to notice this subject further. The practice is of long standing, and is one of the legacies left by Congresses prior to 1861 to their successors.

Upon the merits of the controversy the committee by no means agree with Mr. Manker. Even assuming his statement of the facts to be correct, it is difficult to see how he can be entitled to the money.

If Mr. Spicer, the representative of the Doorkeeper, and, therefore, of the House, procured service which Mr. Manker had undertaken to perform for a less sum than that allowed by the House the difference properly belongs to the funds of the House. Indeed, Mr. Manker himself appears to have received more money than he was entitled to. Justice between him and the Government requires that he should refund the remainder of his $700, he having been absent from his post during the period for which it was paid him, and having rendered no services whatever.

If Mr. Manker really desired to correct abuses, it is difficult to see why he did not apply to this committee. He made a written statement of his grievances, as he says, to the Speaker of the House, whose letter is appended to the testimony, and who very properly referred his friends to the Committee on Accounts. Possibly Mr. Manker knew that though this might result in getting the money paid over to the Government yet it would not benefit him.

It is not to be denied that the expenses of legislation are greater than they should be. This is owing to a number of abuses which the party now in power in Congress found in full vigor at their accession. Many of these have been already remedied. Scarcely a recent session of Congress has passed without laying the ax at the root of some old mischief.

The expenses of investigating committees have been systematized and greatly lessened. During the present session of Congress a limit has been for the first time placed upon the stationery allowed to Senators. Great abuses and extravagances existed in this particular prior to 1861, and to some extent up to the recent enactment. A variety of old abuses in furnishing the Hall and the committee-rooms, the details of which would swell this report unnecessarily, have been remedied by the Thirty-Eighth, Thirty-Ninth, and Fortieth Congresses. Many evils still exist and the committee take this occasion to recommend still further reforms; but vague, monstrous, and incredible charges of fraud discourage investigation, and prevent the correction of actual abuses.

The books of the postmaster show an extravagance in the furnishing of stationery to the various committees, and the mode by which members are supplied appears wasteful and liable to abuse. Until recently no account was required to be rendered by law of the stationery delivered to the postmaster for the members. During the present Congress such a law has been enacted, and unless the system be changed it will be difficult to prevent serious loss annually to the postmaster. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying resolutions upon that subject.

The number of officers and employes of the House is unnecessarily large. But as the reorganization of the House in this respect is now in the hands of another committee it is hoped a proper remedy will be applied. It may be said, however, that even this has yielded to some extent to recent reform. In the Thirty-Fifth Congress the number was two hundred and fifty-seven. Now, notwithstanding the immense increase of legislative business, and the consequent greater necessity for clerks and employes, the number is but two hundred and twenty-one.

The old mischief of voting increased compensation to officers' clerks and employes usually just at the close of the session has yielded to a similar partial reform.

In the Thirty-Fifth Congress, at its second session, as appears by Miscellaneous Document, pages 148-154, the amount voted and paid was $45,862 40 in gold, while during the entire period since January 1, 1867, and up to the present time the amount paid was only $25,444 52 in currency, as appears by table B, appended to this report.

The officers and employes of the House should be adequately paid by regular salaries, and the number should be limited to that sufficient to perform the duties thoroughly.

The attention of the committee has been called to some other matters requiring reformation. The two folding departments need consolidating and reorganizing. The manner in which horses, carriages, and cartage are supplied for the public service needs revising, and some further changes ought to be made in the manner of furnishing the Hall and committee rooms. The committee therefore request power to continue the investigation during the recess and report finally at the next session of Congress.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. M. BROOMALL, Chairman.

The committee report the following resolutions:

Resolved, &c., That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized, as the agent of the House in this behalf, to purchase in the manner provided by law, on the best terms he may find practicable, such stationery as may be requisite for the use of the House and Clerk's office, giving preference in all cases to American manufacture, provided it be equally cheap and of as good quality; that he cause to be recorded in a well bound book, suited to that purpose, the bills and invoices of all the stationery he may so purchase from time to time; that he deliver to the members of Congress and officers hereinafter named the amounts of stationery hereinafter specified, keeping an accurate account of the same, and also of the quantity and value of that used in the Clerk's office, and that hereafter, in the annual reports now required by law to be made by the Clerk, showing the amount of expenditure from the contingent fund of the House, he be required to state, accurately and distinctly, the quantity and cost of all the stationery delivered pursuant to the provisions hereof, and that used in the Clerk's office; also the amount remaining on hand at the time of making such statement, and the amount of unexpended appropriation for stationery: Provided, That the amount furnished to members of Congress may be embraced in a single item.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, required to deliver to every member of the House the usual articles of stationery now furnished to members on an amount not exceeding in value that authorized by law, at the cost price, in the stationery room, or, at the option of the members, to pay them the proper commutation in money; that he keep a true and accurate account of all stationery which he may so deliver to the several members of the House; and if in any case a member shall receive a greater amount of stationery during any session than is above provided, the Clerk shall, before the close of such session, furnish to the Sergeant-at-Arms an account of such excess beyond the amounts above specified, who is hereby required to deduct the amount of such excess from the pay and mileage of such members, and refund the same into the Treasury: Provided, That this limitation is not intended to be made applicable to the use of wrapping-paper and envelopes which may be required in the folding-room.

Resolved, That the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to deliver to every chairman of the committees of the House for the use of such committees, and to the Postmaster, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, for the use of their respective offices at every session of Congress, similar articles of stationery, not exceeding in value an amount which from time to time shall be fixed upon by the Committee on Accounts, and approved by the Speaker.

Mr. BROOMALL. The changes proposed by the committee are embraced in a few items and can be explained in a few words, and, although it is late in the session, I trust the House will adopt the resolutions, for the sooner a reform of this kind is begun the better. The resolutions are nearly a copy of those of March 4, 1842, upon the same subject, preserving the phraseology, except where it is necessary to carry out what the committee recommend to be changed.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to make an inquiry.

Mr. BROOMALL. Certainly.

Mr. DAWES. The resolutions, if I understand them correctly, authorize the Clerk to purchase on account all the stationery. What objection is there to his offering bids?

Mr. BROOMALL. That is the law now, and it is what the resolution requires. The resolutions of March 4, 1842, were passed before the Clerk was required to purchase on bids or proposals. The law requiring this to be done having since been passed, the present resolutions are made to correspond with the law. The words are "in the manner provided by law." That is one change.

The next change in the first resolution is that instead of requiring the Clerk to deliver the stationery to the Postmaster, to be delivered by him to members of the House, it requires him to deliver it to the members at once.

Mr. DAWES. One moment. Without any disposition to oppose the gentleman, I would like to inquire what necessity there is for paying such an enormous price for stationery as is charged in our account. In my own district this paper can be produced for less than half what it stands in our accounts. Note paper is charged six dollars a ream. Now, I do not know much about it, but I never paid more than three dollars a ream at home for note paper. The paper is manufactured in large quantities in my district, and I suppose it would be a matter of economy to go to the factory and purchase it.

Mr. BROOMALL. The practice we propose to institute will test whether or not we are charged too much through the Clerk, because, as the gentleman will see in a little while, we propose to allow members the option of getting their stationery from the Clerk or taking their commutation money and getting it wherever they please. If they find it profitable to get it elsewhere then a more rigid inquiry into the cost price to the Clerk will be necessary to be instituted. But the cost of certain kinds of paper which the gentleman alludes to may be accounted for in this way. That kind of paper has a printed heading, which has to be put on by a separate operation after the paper is purchased, and that increases the cost.

Mr. DAWES. I saw an account coming over here from the Senate, in which the mere printing of the heading added $6 50 to each ream. It seems to me that that is a great deal.

Mr. BROOMALL. That is more than it has cost us at any time. Two or three dollars a ream is all that it has cost the Clerk of the House.

Mr. DAWES. That is the statement I saw.

Mr. BROOMALL. If the gentleman will excuse me, after a brief explanation of the resolutions I will answer any questions.

I was about saying that the second change we propose in the first resolution of March 4, 1862, is to require the Clerk in his published accounts which are made annually, to insert the balance of stationery on hand and the amount of unexpended appropriation for stationery. This will enable anybody from the book to ascertain whether the accounts balance. As at present published it is impossible to do that.

The second resolution substitutes in place of the Postmaster the Clerk of the House. It does away with the store which is kept over in the post-office room, and where there is unavoidably a good deal of waste of stationery.

It requires the Clerk to deliver to members either in stationery or in commutation what they are entitled to. If in stationery, upon their written orders, of course. The object of that is to simplify the transaction, and to bring the whole matter on the Clerk's books, where the whole expenditure can be ascertained, and it will prevent the waste in the post office.

The resolution also requires a report of the amount of stationery furnished to all parties, whereas under the present system the amount handed over to the Postmaster for the use of members is simply given in the Clerk's books, and the Postmaster until recently was not required to account to anybody. By a recent law he is required to account, and if that law is continued, and this change is not made, it will be impossible for the Postmaster to avoid very considerable personal loss. I will say that this change is made, not exactly at the instance of the Clerk and Postmaster, who are the parties interested, but with their entire concurrence. The committee think it will be a decided improvement, simplifying things very much.

The third resolution is entirely new. Heretofore there has been no limit to the amount of stationery given to the chairmen of committees for the use of the committees. There has been considerable inequality in the amount given to the different committees, and it has seemed for some time to the Committee on Accounts that it required regulation.

Mr. RANDALL. Have you the figures showing the inequality?

Mr. BROOMALL. Not in the report. They can be had.

Mr. RANDALL. Will not you give them?

Mr. BROOMALL. Not now. It has seemed to us that a change in this respect has been required for a considerable length of time. There is difficulty in fixing upon an absolute limit for a committee, and that is the reason why the plan embraced in the third resolution was resolved on. The difficulty is this: at some sessions of Congress certain committees require none, and at others they require a very large amount, and hence it would be impossible to regulate it except by fixing a maximum amount, which would probably be pretty certain to be run up to, and thus the Government would probably be as great a loser as now. The plan resolved upon by the committee was the best that occurred to them, and it is this: that at every session of Congress the Committee on Accounts shall ascertain the amount of stationery needed by each of the committees, and that their report on the matter shall be approved by the Speaker, and the Clerk shall then furnish the amount so found to be necessary. This may not be the best system possible, but it is the best the committee could think of.

I am now ready to answer any questions that may be put to me. I do not desire to occupy much time, and shall move the previous question after answering inquiries.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood that there was a minority report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The minority of the committee does not appear to be present.

Mr. RANDALL. It was the understanding that the matter would not be brought up until to-morrow morning.

Mr. BROOMALL. Oh, no; I have no kind of objection to a minority report, not the least; but there was no such understanding as that to which my colleague refers, because I have been trying these three hours to get this report in, and the minority knew it.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McCULLOUGH], who is on the Committee on Accounts, is now preparing a minority report, in which he proposes to recite the facts, which will show that there has been a most loose expenditure of this money.

Mr. BROOMALL. I yielded merely for a question, and not for an argument. I now resume the floor, and, as I promised the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McCULLOUGH] I would do, I ask that he be allowed to present a minority report before the session closes.

Mr. RANDALL. To be printed with the majority report.

No objection was made, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman yield to me for three or five minutes?

Mr. BROOMALL. I will yield to the gentleman for three minutes.

Mr. NIBLACK. As my name has been mentioned in this report, it is perhaps proper that I should make a very brief statement as to my connection with this matter. Major Manker, whom I never personally knew until two or three weeks ago, although I knew there was a person of that name in office here from my State—Major Manker came to me with a copy of the book mentioned in this report. He stated to me the circumstances under which he had prepared it, and his reasons for publishing it. He said he thought the matters embraced in it ought to be published, and desired some assistance. He said that my colleague, [Mr. HOLMAN], who was then absent from the city, had referred him to me in case he [Mr. HOLMAN] had to leave the city. It seems that Mr. HOLMAN, at his request, had procured some information from the Treasury Department; that was his only connection with the matter.

As I had no time to read the book myself, and not feeling specially interested in the matter, I declined to give it any attention, alleging want of time, and feeling, perhaps, a want of inclination. I referred him to the Democratic executive committee here, who have charge of the distribution of documents. The book was referred to some members of the committee, resident in the District not members of Congress, and I am informed that after examining it they came to the conclusion that it embraced many matters that should come before the public. They agreed to give him some assistance in the publication of the book; what that assistance was I do not know. The book will be published I am advised, and will be for sale at the bookstores and wherever else such books might be looked for. I have had no further connection with the matter.

Mr. SHANKS. I would ask my colleague [Mr. NIBLACK] where he obtained the information he now gives to the House as to the purchase of this book from Mr. Manker?

Mr. NIBLACK. The information I have, which is but partial, I derived from Mr. John D. Hoover, of this city. I never asked for all the facts, nor do I know what they are.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The three minutes allowed the gentleman have expired.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman will allow me to make one other remark.

Mr. BROOMALL. Very well.

Mr. NIBLACK. Major Manker has now left the city, and is not here. I am therefore not sufficiently advised in regard to the matters mentioned in the report to be able to speak positively in regard to them.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BROOMALL. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to know of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, [Mr. BROOMALL], inasmuch as charges have been made through the papers against the Doorkeeper of the House, General Lippincott, whether or not in the investigations of the committee they have found anything showing any improper conduct on his part connected with his office here?

Mr. BROOMALL. We find nothing in the conduct of the Doorkeeper to complain of. He has followed certain precedents which we speak of as being bad ones. But there is nothing whatever to complain of in his conduct, and he was one of the first to suggest some of the reforms we propose. The same remarks will apply to the Clerk, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Postmaster. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], and I do so now.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, I desire nothing further in regard to this matter than to seek a remedy for any abuses which may exist. I have no charges to make against any person. But I observe that the contracts for supplying us with stationery are let to a certain firm in this city. I observe, also, that the same firm has the contracts for furnishing stationery to all the Departments, and this is the firm that furnishes stationery to the Patent Office, in reference to which the Committee on Printing reported that the Patent Office gave eighty dollars per thousand sheets for paper which is purchasable in New York for thirteen dollars per thousand sheets. I am hence led to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Accounts [Mr. BROOMALL] whether he has pursued his investigation so far as to be able to answer why it is that this firm furnishes paper the stamp-mark upon which is exceedingly familiar to me, being made within sight of my own house—paper I can purchase at retail for two dollars or two dollars and a half per ream—why this firm gets through advertising for bids all the contracts for furnishing stationery, not only to this House, but to all the Departments, and why we are somehow or other charged six or eight dollars per ream for this same kind of paper to which I have just referred?

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I can only answer the gentleman's question by saying that I have already answered a part of it, as to the cause of the increased cost of paper to us. It results from the printed headings.

Mr. DAWES. Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. BROOMALL. I never use any of that kind, but many gentlemen do.

Mr. DAWES. I do not refer to that paper at all.

Mr. BROOMALL. Again, the attention of the committee was not directed to that subject. The allegations did not embrace it. This is the first time I have ever heard a suspicion of unfairness started in regard to the issuing of these proposals or the making of contracts by the Clerk. Whether there is any special reason why this firm gets the contracts for all the Departments other than the fact that they are the lowest bidders I do not know. If there is anything wrong in reference to this matter it should, as a matter of course, be remedied. All the inquiries touching that matter, and up to this one, which, as I say, is new to us, led us to conclude that there was nothing wrong in the purchase of paper. I do not say, however, that there has not been any wrong in that respect; but if there has been, it can be investigated under the resolution under which the committee is acting, and will be investigated.

Let me say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that from the beginning of my service upon this committee it has been its earnest endeavor—and the Democratic members who have served on the committee will, I think, sustain me in this declaration—to find out irregularities and correct them wherever it could be done. I have no idea that there is anything in the suspicion—for it amounts to nothing else—thrown out by the gentleman from Massachusetts, of unfairness on the letting of these contracts.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman has misunderstood me. I do not allude to any irregularities. The matters to which I refer seem to occur very regularly. [Laughter.] I do not allude to any printed heads or anything of that kind. I have been led to make this inquiry from the fact that I know these manufacturers have endeavored at different times within the last ten years to put in bids for the supplying of the stationery to the different Departments in Washington, and I know that they have failed. I know that notwithstanding their earnest desire to supply the Government with paper at a fairly remunerative rate they have not been allowed the opportunity, while the Government has been subjected to these exorbitant charges.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania—for I know he is faithful and honest in this matter—whether, instead of authorizing the clerk to advertise for bids, as is now done, it would not be better to authorize him to go where the paper is made and purchase it there, as the gentleman and I would purchase paper?

Mr. BROOMALL. That might probably be an advantage; and the propositions of the committee, as I have already said, lead in that direction. If further reform is necessary it will be an easy matter to accomplish it at some future time. It is now too late in the session to perfect at this time any reform in that respect. If the constituents of the gentleman, however, will make a proposal when next the opportunity is offered, and if they bid at a lower rate than the successful competitor, and the matter is brought to the attention of the House, it will, if referred to our committee, be rigidly inquired into.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, when I first came to Congress, ten years ago, I was appointed chairman of a committee whose duty it was to investigate the accounts of the outgoing Clerk, primarily his stationery accounts. We investigated the subject at very great length, summoning before us every subordinate who could give any information upon the question. At that time it was the practice, as it is at present, to advertise for proposals for the specific articles required. The proposals were sent in with samples, and exhibited in one of the rooms here. The present Journal Clerk and the then reading Clerk were appointed to examine the proposals and samples and to select articles on the best terms. It seemed to be, so far as we could judge, entirely fair; and yet the fact appears as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has already stated. The source I was then unable to detect, and I am unable to do so now; but I am satisfied if the plan suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts was adopted, of authorizing the Clerk to go out and make contracts according as he might choose, unless you had a Clerk more exempt from the weakness of human nature than many of our public functionaries have been in times past, he would never be able to discover that cheap and excellent paper which the gentleman was able to find when in his own town. If the present plan is properly carried out it affords as little opportunity for fraud as any other I can think of. Yet it happens in the different changes of administration that a particular firm gets the large proportion of the contracts. How it is done the gentleman, who is an older and more sagacious man than I am, will perhaps be able to tell.

Mr. BROOMALL. If the power to continue the investigation be assented to by the House that will be inquired into by the committee. I will yield now for two minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. ELA. Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in regard to the firm that supplies the House with stationery being the firm alluded to the other day in the report from the Printing Committee that supplied the Patent Office with bond paper. There are other gentlemen beside those alluded to who supply the different Departments with stationery.

While I am up I will add another word. Gentlemen complain that contracts are awarded not at the lowest prices at which the material can be procured of manufacturers. If the idea of the resolution introduced the other day by the Committee on Printing be adopted it will establish a stationery bureau here, not only for the Departments of the Government, but for the House and Senate, so that stationery will be furnished by contracts with first parties.

Now, sir, I hold in my hand a schedule of different prices for furnishing different articles to one Department of the Government. While one party proposed to furnish envelopes at fifteen dollars a thousand another proposed to furnish the same envelopes at five cents per thousand.

A MEMBER. Five cents?

Mr. ELA. Yes, sir; five cents. One party proposed to furnish the parchment paper used in that Department for twenty-five cents a sheet, which is fair price, while the other proposed to furnish it at one cent. The truth is that the whole contract system as now managed is vicious from the beginning to the end. An individual having an understanding with the Department can so shape his bids as to get any contract he chooses. It was so with the Interior Department for the present year. While one party whose bids in the aggregate for stationery amounted to $4,594, lost the contract the other party obtained the contract, although the bids amounted to $22,624 for the same articles.

It was so arranged that the bids were less by footing up the bids for single articles, and the Department paid no attention to the aggregate price.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I have no belief that any such iniquity as that spoken of by the gentleman from New Hampshire as existing in other Departments of the Government exists in the Clerk's office.

Mr. ROSS. I object to continuing the committee. They have been long in session and done no good. They do not intend to expose anything. They cover it up all the time.

Mr. BROOMALL. We have been investigating only for a short time.

Mr. KERR. I hope the gentleman will yield to me.

Mr. BROOMALL. I cannot.

Mr. KERR. He has yielded all around, and will not now yield to us on this side.

Mr. BROOMALL. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. KERR. Ten minutes.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. BROOMALL. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. KERR. Before I proceed I desire to ask the gentleman whether this committee have reported all the evidence taken thus far?

Mr. BROOMALL. We have reported all the evidence taken so far.

Mr. KERR. Have they examined all the witnesses whose names have been given to them?

Mr. BROOMALL. They have examined all the witnesses brought before them. The resolution did not authorize us to compel the attendance of witnesses. We resorted to that expedient in one instance before that was thought of. But no witnesses refused to come. Any witness named by any member of the committee, was requested to come before us and be examined, and as far as I know did so.

Mr. KERR. Were they brought before the committee and examined as the names were given by the gentleman whose name I now forget—a major somebody?

Mr. BROOMALL. Those witnesses were not all examined, because Mr. Spicer admitted the facts which it was alleged they would prove, that is, that they had paid him so much money.

Mr. KERR. Is that true in regard to them all?

Mr. BROOMALL. As far as I know.

Mr. KERR. I had the honor to serve during the Thirty-Ninth Congress on the Committee on Accounts. While I was so engaged I became familiar with the mode of transacting the business of the House, so far as it was conducted before that committee. It was most unpardonably loose and reckless. I tried over and over again to have that mode changed, to have a reform introduced; to have safeguards thrown around the conduct of the business by the committee and by the officers of the House. I succeeded on one occasion in getting the House to make an order that every officer of the House who should present any account to be audited and paid should attach to that account his oath, stating that it was regular and proper, or that the money had been properly expended according to the laws and regulations of the House for the expenditure of its contingent fund. Thereupon, from some singular cause, the officers of the House at once ceased to present their reports to the committee or their accounts to be audited, until some six weeks thereafter a motion was made and carried to repeal that order. From the time of that repeal I do not know of a single safeguard that has ever been thrown around the action of the committee by the House. Now, I do not believe—and this I say in justice to the committee—that it was in the power of the committee without the order of the House to inaugurate this necessary reform. But I do say that the committee ought then, and ought now, to insist upon a reform. They ought to require that these officers, when they bring their accounts to be audited, shall purge their own consciences at least, and show to the committee, through their own names and under their own oaths, that they have obeyed the law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROOMALL. The gentleman speaks of a resolution which he procured to be passed requiring the officers of the House to swear to every claim presented by them before the Committee on Accounts, and says that the resolution was subsequently repealed. That is true, and it was done at the instance of the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. KERR. This is the first time I ever heard of that. I am very glad to know it. It shows the animus of the whole thing.

Mr. BROOMALL. The officers who presented the bills were not those to whom the bills were paid, and then a resolution passed by the committee was substituted in the place of the affidavit of the parties who received the money, who did know how much was due while the officers frequently did not. And I will now inform the gentleman of what he does not seem to know, that not a single bill has ever been passed by the Committee on Accounts since the time he speaks of, if my recollection is right, certainly since the present committee was organized, without having the affidavit of the party to whom the money was paid that it was due, that the bill was proper, and that no other person but himself had any interest in it, except where the claim was for a salary or for pay fixed by law or resolution of the House, which rendered such an affidavit unnecessary.

I will make one other observation. Something has been said about incorporating in this resolution a provision changing the manner in which the Clerk purchases his stationery. I will state, for the information of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], that that could not be done. The act of August 26, 1842, requires that it shall be purchased exactly in the manner it now is, and if any change is made in that particular it must be done by law, and not by a resolution of the House. I now call the previous question.

Mr. KERR. I desire to say that the affidavit to which the gentleman has referred was not required while I was on the Committee on Accounts.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROOMALL. I now ask authority that the sum of $4 20 be paid to the witness Manker, the amount due him for witness fees. That is the only expense incurred.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

UNITED STATES CONSUL AT PANAMA.

Mr. VAN WYCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to inform this House how long during the last fifteen months the consul at Panama has been absent from his post, the reason of such absence, and whether by the approbation of the State Department.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence after to-day was granted to Mr. SMITH, on account of the illness of his brother.

Leave of absence was granted to Mr. HUNTER, on account of sickness in his family.

JOHN H. OSLER.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee of Claims to report a bill for the relief of a soldier wounded at the battle of Kenesaw mountain, and I desire to state to the House that the bill involves no more than $800 at most. I desire to state further that the bill passed this House in the Thirty-Ninth Congress without a division. Under the existing law this soldier cannot have relief nor have his accounts settled by reason of the fact that being a sergeant at the time he received his wounds he was not able to render any account whatever to the Government, although no one claims that he is capable of defrauding any one to the extent of a farthing, because his clothing, his papers, and everything pertaining to him, while he lay covered with his wounds, was carried away by an unknown person. The bill is but ten lines long, it explains itself, and it stands within the general purview of previous laws of this very Congress, giving like compensation to commissioned lieutenants. I ask unanimous consent to report the bill, and that it be put upon its passage.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee of Claims, then reported a bill (H. R. No. 1451) for the relief of Lieutenant John H. Osler, of Guernsey county, Ohio; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND DISTRICT IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. TAFTE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 579, to establish a new land district in the State of Nebraska, for consideration at this time.

No objection was made, and the bill was taken up, read a first, second, and third time, and passed.

Mr. TAFTE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Indefinite leave of absence was granted to Mr. NICHOLSON, on account of the sickness of his wife.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that as many members here are really not in good health, and as many have obtained leave of absence, there is a possibility that there may not be a quorum here this evening or to-morrow morning. If the Senate should grant the request of the House for a committee of conference on the funding bill the committee will not be able to report before to-morrow afternoon. The Chair would therefore express a hope that a majority of members will remain here, so as to act upon the report of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There is a bill upon the Speaker's table from the Senate extending the revenue laws of this country over the newly-acquired territory of Alaska. It is a bill of the greatest public importance, being for the purpose of preventing smuggling there, and the preservation of the seal fisheries. I ask that it may be now considered.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I am willing to begin at the top of the pile and go down, or at the bottom of the pile and go up, but I object to taking up special bills out of their regular order.

ALEXANDRIA CANAL.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 1275, relating to the Alexandria canal.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the Senate amendments be concurred in. They are pretty severe, yet they are the best we can get this session.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. HOPKINS. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 767, to regulate the disposition of lands that may be hereafter granted to aid in the construction of railways, was recommitted to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill, which was read, provides that all lands which may hereafter be granted to aid in the construction of railways shall, unless otherwise expressly provided in the act granting the same, be sold by the State or Territory, corporation, or company to which said grant is made to actual settlers, in quantities no greater than one quarter section, to any one person, and at a price to be fixed by the company which shall build the road, not exceeding $2 50 per acre, and the amount received for the said land shall be paid by the State or Territory to the company constructing said road, after deducting all the expense incurred by the State or Territory in making such sales. And all sales so made shall be made upon the following terms, namely: one fourth of the amount thereof shall be paid in cash at the time of purchase, and the balance thereof shall be paid by the settler in three annual installments with interest, not to exceed seven per cent. per annum, until paid. And the Secretary of the Interior shall have power to prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this act into effect, and no person shall be deemed an actual settler who does not furnish evidence, in such form as the Governor of the State or Territory may prescribe, that it is his or her intention to enter upon, improve, and reside upon the lands he or she may purchase; provided further, that any alternate even-numbered sections along the line of any railway, which have not been sold or entered upon by actual settlers within ten years from and after the survey and location of said railway, shall be disposed of on the same terms as other public lands of the United States.

The question was upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration was agreed upon by the Committee on the Public Lands several months ago, and I was instructed to report the same to the House. I have had no opportunity to call it up until now. I do not desire to detain the House by any lengthy explanation of its provision. Those who have listened to the reading will understand and appreciate its object, and at this late hour of the session I will not trespass upon the time of the House by a lengthy discussion. It will be observed that the bill proposes a reform in the manner of granting lands to aid in the construction of railroads.

While the committee do not propose by this bill to oppose granting lands to aid in constructing railroads in the new States and Territories, they do propose a radical change in the manner of making these grants hereafter. The objection to the grants heretofore made is that they have not been sufficiently guarded to protect the rights and interests of the settler. Grants of public land heretofore made for these objects have either been conferred direct upon the corporations building the road, or made to the States, and by the States granted to the corporations, without any restrictions or provisions for keeping the land in market for the benefit of those desiring the same for settlement and cultivation. Under this policy the railroad corporations have been able to withdraw vast tracts of land from the market and hold them for an unlimited time out of the reach of persons desiring to purchase for actual settlement, thereby retarding the settlement of the country, and doing manifest injustice to those seeking homes for cultivation by creating vast land monopolies. The evil of this system must be apparent to all; and while I believe in a liberal policy of Government aid toward all these works of internal improvement so necessary to the development and prosperity of the country, and while I feel that under proper restrictions, such as this bill provides, no better use can be made of a portion of the public domain than to donate it to aid in the construction of railroads, I am nevertheless convinced that the aid can be as effectually extended without granting the lands absolutely to the corporations but by making the grants to the States and having the lands sold by the States to actual settlers, giving the proceeds of the sale to the corporations which construct the roads. By this system we avoid a great and growing evil in this country of immense corporate land monopolies.

Up to this time the Government has granted about fifty-seven million acres of public lands to aid railroad enterprises; and of this large quantity, embracing some of the most fertile and productive lands of the country, over nine tenths are still held by railroad corporations and have never been offered in the market at all. In this estimate I do not include the very liberal grants which have been made to aid in the construction of the Pacific roads. Under the policy up to this time the rights of the settler have been entirely ignored, and the pernicious effects of placing such vast quantities of the public lands of the country in the grasp of corporations, to be by them held out of market and out of reach of those desiring them for homes, driving the settler back further into the wilderness, and compelling him by his toil to add to the value of the lands held by corporate monopolists, has been widely felt, and demands at our hands a speedy and effectual remedy.

The bill under consideration, in my judgment, provides the remedy for this evil by adopting a policy for all future grants which will prevent the land granted from going into the possession of corporations, while by giving the proceeds of the sales of such grants to the corporations constructing the roads it will encourage the extension of our railway system, while at the same time it protects the rights of the settler by keeping the lands constantly in the market at a low price, thereby promoting the rapid settlement of the country through which the road passes. It is believed that under this system the corporations receiving the aid will derive more substantial advantages than they would if the lands were actually granted to them as the country along the lines of the roads will be rapidly settled and made productive, thereby largely increasing the business and profits of the corporations. I am unable to see any valid objection to this necessary reform in our land policy, and I feel confident if it is adopted it will result to the advantage of the people of the country. I trust the bill may pass.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Does this bill apply only to grants hereafter to be made?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman yield a couple of minutes to me?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir, I yield two minutes.

Mr. HIGBY. I wish to say that this bill embraces some principles which at a proper time I should be very glad to favor; but it seems to me this is an inopportune occasion to bring up a measure of such importance when we cannot properly investigate the principles concerned in it. For this reason I hope the gentleman will consent to let the bill lie over till the commencement of next session, as there is no danger of any land being granted to any railroad meanwhile.

Mr. HOPKINS. I cannot consent to that.

Mr. LOAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. LOAN. I observe that this bill provides that the land shall be sold to actual settlers at a price not exceeding $2 50 per acre. I desire to inquire whether the land may be sold to any other persons than actual settlers?

Mr. HOPKINS. Under the provisions of this bill the land can be sold only to actual settlers.

Mr. LOAN. If there should be no actual settlers on the land for twenty years would not the company be permitted to sell it to those who have purchased, for instance, adjoining land? Suppose there are portions of the land which are undesirable, so as not to be taken up separately, are they to be excluded from market, the company thus being deprived of the benefit of the grant for twenty, thirty, or forty years, and the States of the taxes on the land during all that time?

Mr. HOPKINS. Not at all. The bill provides for the sale of the land to persons desiring to settle on it; and the Secretary of the Interior is to carry out the provisions of the bill by proper regulations.

Mr. LOAN. But I understand the actual settler can only take one quarter section.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is all.

Mr. LOAN. And if the land adjoining his quarter section should be undesirable for other persons to occupy that will not be sold for all time to come.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no provision for the sale of any portion of this land except to actual settlers.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I am aware, sir, that I have no time to discuss the merits of this bill; but I will say that it has been fully considered by the Committee on the Public Lands. It has been before the House and repeatedly considered. I hope the bill will pass. It is demanded by the public interests and demanded by the settlers upon the public lands, and if we adjourn this Congress without passing this bill or something like it we will fail in our duty to the country and to the men who desire to secure homes upon the public lands.

On the 20th January I had the honor to introduce House bill No. 492, to secure to actual settlers the right to purchase lands hereafter granted to railway and other companies, which provided—

"That all lands which may hereafter be granted to railway or other companies to aid in the construction of railways or other works, whether under existing law or laws hereafter enacted, shall be sold by such grantees only to actual settlers in quantities not greater than one half section to any one person, and at a price not exceeding $1 25 per acre, &c.

The bill now under consideration is designed to accomplish the same purpose and also to reach those cases where lands have been granted to States to aid in the construction of railroads. The bill will reach all grants or conveyances by patent hereafter made to the Union Pacific and other railroad companies, whether in pursuance of existing laws or laws hereafter enacted authorizing such grants. Its object is to secure the lands to actual settlers at a moderate price, and to prevent many of the evils arising from the accumulation of large bodies of lands in the hands of corporations. It seeks in part to carry out a policy somewhat similar to that provided by the homestead laws, the wisdom of which is now universally acknowledged.

I have already given my views briefly on this subject, and will not further repeat them now. I may say that the policy of this bill has been inaugurated for the first time during this session of Congress, and the Committee on the Public Lands will not agree to the passage of any bill authorizing grants of lands to railroad companies which does not embrace the policy of this bill. To perfect our land policy Congress should not only enact this bill into a law but abrogate as void all sales of land made in large bodies in pursuance of treaties with the Indian tribes. The joint resolution passed a few days since for the protection of the settlers on the Cherokee neutral lands in part abrogated a sale made under such a treaty. Now, let Congress abrogate the treaties or sales under them, in other cases, and we will only vindicate the right of Congress to dictate the land policy of the country by denying the right of the treaty-making power to control it. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a famous case arising under an Indian treaty, reported in the fifth volume of Peters's Reports, if I remember correctly, doubted the right of the treaty-making power to dispose of public lands. And while upon this subject I may refer to other authorities to show the power to annul all such treaties. I quote from the American Law Register, January, 1868, vol. 7, No. 3, N. S., page 149; Gray vs. the Clinton bridge and others, in the circuit court of the United States for Iowa, October term, 1867. The act of Congress of February 27, 1867, (16 U. S. Stat., 412,) declared the Clinton bridge "a lawful structure and post route." Gray filed a bill to abate the bridge. He objected to the act of Congress that it violated treaties with foreign nations, which declared that the navigation of the Mississippi should remain unobstructed. The court, Miller judge, said:

"The courts possess no power to declare a statute passed by Congress void because it may violate such [treaty] obligations. These are international questions, to be settled between the foreign nations interested in the treaties and the political departments of our Government. When these Departments declare a treaty abrogated, annulled, or modified, it is not for the judicial branch of the Government to set it up and assert its continual obligation."

And to the same effect I may refer to an act to declare the treaties heretofore concluded with France no longer obligatory on the United States, approved July 7, 1793, (1 U. S. Stat. at Large, 578,) and to Barclay's Digest of 1867, page 136, (Jefferson's Manual,) where it is said "an act of the Legislature alone can declare them (treaties) infringed and rescinded;" and to General BANKS's speech in the House of Representatives on the passage of the Alaska bill, July 14, 1868, in which he declared Congress could abrogate treaties.

Mr. HOPKINS. I must now call for the previous question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to know of the gentleman who reports this bill whether he supposes, when Congress hereafter makes a grant of lands to a railroad corporation different from the provisions of this bill, it will not to that extent repeal this bill? How can this Congress prohibit future Congresses from disposing of the public lands as they may see fit? This will not govern any other Congress.

Mr. HOPKINS. My understanding is that we settle a policy by which we propose to be governed hereafter, or ought to be governed, in regard to the aid we may give to railroad corporations by grants of the public lands. I do not suppose it is possible for this Congress to prevent any future Congress from making any stipulations it may deem proper, but we do propose to declare what is the settled policy of this Congress in regard to these grants of the public land. I will say, although we have had thirty bills before the Committee on the Public Lands asking for grants of land, not one has been reported without the clause contained in this bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Why not continue that practice when we make grants so it may be binding? If we incorporate it in no future legislation how can it affect the rights which may then accrue? I will suggest to my colleague that it can have no effect whatever. It is a mere legislative declaration. It is absolutely useless. Does it relate to grants hereafter made?

Mr. HOPKINS. It does not.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then it is a mere declaration of a policy which is to control, or undertake to control, future Congresses.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is my colleague in favor of the provisions of this bill or not?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I am in favor of the provisions of this bill as applicable to grants of land, but I can see no reason for making this useless legislative declaration.

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to remind the gentleman that the Democratic party stole this bill and put it into their platform.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is a good place for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. They have made better use of these principles than to put them in this bill. That is the platform of a great, just, patriotic, powerful party. This Congress is now attempting to pass this bill in order to steal our thunder.

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Democratic party has more power than this Congress?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Yes; for it will turn it out of power at the next election. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. What good is it in the Democratic platform if it is not to become the law?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If it is put into the platform of the Democratic party it will control the legislation of the country, while this Congress will expire on the 4th of March next.

Mr. MULLINS. The false prophet must be stoned to death. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I suppose they would stoned to death a really national man in his country.

Mr. HOPKINS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. KELSEY. I move that the House take a recess till half past ten to-morrow morning.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that we take a recess until half past seven this evening.

Mr. DRIGGS. I object to any business. Let the vote be taken on adjourning.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD, to take a recess till half past seven o'clock this evening; and it was disagreed to—ayes 48, noes 61.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. KELSEY, to take a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. PILE. I move to amend by making it till eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to amend by making it half past ten o'clock.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes sixty-one, noes not counted.

The motion of Mr. KELSEY, as amended, was then agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess till half past ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

AFTER RECESS.

The House reassembled pursuant to order at half past ten o'clock a. m., [Saturday, July 24.]

LIGHTING THE STREETS OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. KOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee for the District of Columbia Senate joint resolution No. 57, relative to lighting the streets of Washington, District of Columbia, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was read as follows:

Joint resolution relative to lighting the streets of Washington, District of Columbia, reducing the expenses and for other purposes.

Whereas the municipal authorities of the city of Washington have failed to carry out the arrangements for lighting the streets of said city, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government," approved July 28, 1866; Therefore, Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to levy and collect a tax from the property-holders of the city of Washington sufficient to defray the expense of lighting the avenue and street lamps of said city with six-foot burners twenty-one nights in each month, from dark until daylight, and keep said lamps so lighted each year.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior, for the Government of the United States, and the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington, for the city, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed immediately upon the passage of this joint resolution, severally, to contract with the Washington Gas-light Company (if said company shall agree thereto) for a term of fifteen years for the United States Government, and for the city for such a term, not exceeding fifteen years, as may be agreed upon, for all the illuminating gas required in the city of Washington by the United States, and for the avenue and street lamps and public offices of the city in the city of Washington, in accordance with the provisions of this joint resolution, at the reduced price of three dollars net per thousand feet: Provided, however, That the price paid under said contract shall at no time within said term of fifteen years exceed the price charged by said company to the citizens of Washington, and that the quality of said illuminating gas shall not be less than fifteen candles standard: And provided further, That the right is reserved to the United States and to the mayor and city councils of Washington to annul the contracts authorized hereby at any time after ten years by giving two years' notice.

SEC. 3. And be it further resolved, That the mayor and city councils of the city of Washington be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to increase from time to time, as the public good may require, the number of street lamps on any of the streets, lanes, alleys, public ways, and grounds in the city of Washington, and to do any and all things pertaining to the well lighting of the city, and to levy and collect a tax from the property holders thereof.

SEC. 4. And be it further resolved, That in the event of the failure of the mayor and city councils to levy and collect the tax herein authorized, or to light the said city as herein directed, then the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to levy a tax upon the property of said city and to collect the same, sufficient to light said city for the current year, and so from year to year, in case of such failure of said mayor and city councils to light as herein directed, and to fully execute the provisions of this joint resolution in the place and stead of the said mayor and city councils.

SEC. 5. And be it further resolved, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relieve the said Washington Gas-light Company from paying the internal revenue tax imposed by law.

Mr. KOONTZ. I will merely state that this joint resolution, if passed and carried out, will save, in the course of ten years, some two hundred thousand dollars. The saving of expense yearly in lighting the avenue and Four-and-a-half street will probably be $30,000. I presume there will be no objection to the passage of the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to; and the joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KOONTZ moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMISSION OF MEMBERS' FINES.

Mr. GETZ, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the fees and fines imposed upon members of this House for being absent without leave at the present session be remitted.

PATERSON SOLDIERS' MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 358) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish cannon to the soldiers' monument in Paterson, New Jersey.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not object to that, but there is a matter of public business of such vast importance on the Speaker's table that I hope it will be acted upon at once. It is the bill extending the revenue laws to the Territory of Alaska.

The bill was read a first and second time, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now hope, as a matter of public duty, we will pass the bill of the Senate extending the revenue laws to Alaska.

Mr. POMEROY. I call for the regular order.

LAND GRANTS FOR RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the motion pending at the recess yesterday, made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HOPKINS] on the 20th of February last, to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 767) to regulate the disposition of lands that may be hereafter granted to aid in the construction of railways was re-committed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to, and the motion to recommit was disagreed to; and the bill was brought before the House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POMEROY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous order of the House until twelve o'clock to-day the House will proceed to business on the Speaker's table. Unless, therefore, by unanimous consent it is otherwise ordered, the Chair will refuse to receive conference reports until twelve o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. GORHAM, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 722) for the relief of Sally C. Northrop;

An act (H. R. No. 1822) for the relief of Major F. F. Stevens, assistant paymaster United States Army;

An act (H. R. No. 834) for the relief of Hon. George W. Bridges, a member of the Thirty-Seventh Congress;

An act (H. R. No. 1865) for the relief of Captain Thomas W. Miller;

An act (H. R. No. 1866) for the relief of Captain A. G. Oliver; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 269) giving the assent of the United States to the construction of certain wharves in the harbor of Oswego, New York.

The message further announced that the Senate insisted on their disagreement to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 207) for funding the national debt, and for the conversion of the notes of the United States, agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORGAN, and Mr. WILLIAMS conferees on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 939) to provide for an American line of mail and emigrant passenger steamships between New York and one or more European ports.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 576) to refer the claim of Joseph Segar to the Court of Claims, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Mr. POMEROY. I demand the regular order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the regular order is demanded, I shall insist that no business shall be done without a quorum.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think we had better harmonize matters.

Mr. POMEROY. I insist on the regular order of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Any member will be entitled to demand a division on any question, which will disclose the absence of a quorum.

SALE OF HAY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill of the Senate (S. No. 450) to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WELKER. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read. It provides that all hay and straw which may be sold by weight in the District of Columbia shall be sold by the net hundred, and every two thousand pounds net weight shall be a ton.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for a division on the passage of the bill.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 80, noes 6. No quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ORTH and BINGHAM were appointed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from New York will agree that we shall pass the Alaska bill, to which I referred just now, after we get through with the Speaker's table at twelve o'clock, I will not insist on a division.

Mr. POMEROY. No, sir.

Mr. O'NEILL. If I were the gentleman from New York I would not yield to what appears to be obstinacy and nothing else. Let the gentleman take the responsibility of breaking up a quorum if he chooses.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 6. No quorum voting.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Axtell, Baldwin, Barnes, Barnum, Beaman, Benjamin, Benton, Blaine, Boles, Bowen, Boyer, Brownell, Brooks, Burr, Cary, Chandler, Charcull, Cook, Cornell, Dockery, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finney, Fox, Glossbrenner, Goss, Gravely, G iswold, Haight, Harding, Hawkins, Henton, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Richard D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Julian, Kellogg, Kitchon, Lush, George V. Van Horn, Van Trump, Vidal, Cadwalader C. Washburn, Thomas Williams, William Williams, James F. Wilson, Wood, Woodbridge, and Woodward.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and fourteen members have answered to their names.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JUDD. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. Cook, is so unwell as to be unable to attend this morning.

Mr. BUCKLEY. I would state that my colleague, Mr. NORRIS, has been confined to his bed by sickness for the past three days.

SALE OF HAY IN THE DISTRICT.

The question recurred upon the passage of Senate bill No. 450, to regulate the sale of hay in the District of Columbia.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer a parliamentary question.

Mr. O'NEILL. The House on yesterday resolved to proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table at half past ten o'clock this morning. Now, I am in favor of going on with that business until it is completed. I would, therefore, ask whether after twelve o'clock to day, when the session of Saturday shall have commenced, the House can then proceed with and finish the business on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule upon that question, if then raised, when the hour of twelve o'clock shall have arrived.

BOUNTIES TO COLORED SOLDIERS.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, from the select committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the pay department, submitted a report in part upon a special matter investigated by them at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the payment of bounties to colored soldiers; which report was ordered to be printed and recommitting.

LINCOLN TERRITORY.

Mr. MULLINS, by unanimous consent, reported back adversely from the Committee on the Territories House bill No. 86, providing a territorial government for Lincoln Territory; which was laid on the table.

TAX ON EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

Mr. CULLOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1452) to repeal section one hundred and thirty-six of the act of June 30, 1804, entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

WILLIAM GRANT POWERS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hold in my hand a small bill of eight or ten lines, providing for the admission of an insane person to the insane asylum of this District. His name is William Grant Powers, and he is the son of the late Rev. Grant Powers, who died, leaving Mrs. Eliza H. Powers, his wife, without property, with six children to maintain and educate. Her son, William Grant Powers, became insane from overwork the hot days in June, 1851, and has since been entirely dependent upon the exertions of his mother for his support in an asylum. He is now in the asylum in Concord, New Hampshire, and is incurable. Mrs. E. H. Powers devoted herself to the comfort of the sick and wounded soldiers of our Army for three years, from May, 1861. She was one of the agents of the United States Sanitary Commission, and collected in the town where she lived, in New Jersey, $10,000 in money by her own personal application and superintended the making of twenty-one thousand hospital articles. This money and these hospital articles she sent and distributed to our soldiers. In camp and hospital, at home and abroad, for three years, until her health totally failed, Mrs. Powers is now nearly sixty-six years old, and works daily in the Department, but finds with her utmost exertions that she cannot longer maintain her insane son in an asylum. She therefore asks he may be admitted free into the Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia, where she now resides. William G. Powers became insane before he was twenty-one years old, therefore must take the domicile of his mother.

I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for the purpose I have indicated, to be considered at this time.

No objection was made.

Accordingly a bill (H. R. No. 1453) for the relief of William Grant Powers was introduced, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to admit into the Government Hospital for the Insane in the District of Columbia William Grant Powers, an insane person, son of Mrs. Eliza H. Powers, widow, and an employé under the Government.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT TO CONSTITUTION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House joint resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia, ratifying the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States and accepting conditions proposed by Congress; which were referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The House resumed the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table.

The next business was Senate bill No. 440, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864; which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The motion was agreed to.

APPEALS AND WRITS OF ERROR.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was Senate bill No. 472, supplementary to an act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security;" which was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The question was upon the third reading of the bill.

The bill, which was read, proposes to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act to allow the United States to prosecute appeals and writs of error without giving security," approved February 21, 1863, to writs of error, appeals, or other process in law, admiralty, or equity, issuing from, or brought up to, a circuit court of the United States.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think this bill should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend by adding as a new section what is in substance a bill which has already passed the Senate, and which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any corporation or any member thereof, other than a banking corporation, organized under a law of the United States, and against which a suit at law or in equity has been or may be commenced in any court other than a circuit or district court of the United States, may have such suit removed from the court in which it may be pending to the proper circuit or district court of the United States, for any liability or alleged liability of such corporation or any member thereof as such member upon filing a petition therefor, verified by oath, either before or after issue joined, stating that they have a defense arising under or by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, or any treaty or law of the United States, and offering good and sufficient surety for entering in such court on the first day of its session, copies of all processes, pleadings, depositions, testimony, and other proceedings in said suit, and doing such other appropriate acts as are required to be done by the act entitled "An act for the removal of causes in certain cases from State courts," approved July 27, 1866; and it shall be thereupon the duty of the court to accept the surety and proceed no further in the suit; and the said copies being entered as aforesaid in such court of the United States, the suit shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been brought there by original process, and all the provisions of said act in this section referred to, respecting any bail, attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, and respecting any bond of indemnity or other obligation, given upon the issuing or granting of any attachment, injunction, or other restraining process, shall apply with like force and effect in all respects to similar matters, process, or effects in the suits for the removal of which this act provides.

Mr. MAYNARD. In deference to the opinion of other gentlemen, rather than my own judgment, I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the amendment offered by me has, as a separate bill, passed the Senate of the United States. The amendment which I offer I have no doubt is a provision in which the Government of the United States is as deeply interested as any corporation or corporation of the United States. It concerns the interests of the whole country; and if it was deemed important for the public interests, as it certainly was, by the representatives of the people in Congress assembled to create these corporate trusts, it is certainly important to protect them in the courts of the United States. I hope that the amendment will be adopted and the bill passed.

Mr. MARSHALL. When this bill was read I attempted to get the floor for the purpose of moving its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. As soon as the title was read, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] obtained the floor and moved his amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. My reason for desiring the reference of the bill is that I think a measure of this importance ought not to be passed without a reference to some committee of this House. It must change very radically the legislation of the country.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that this bill does not, as the gentleman says, "change very radically the legislation of this country;" but it makes the general legislation of this country which has been in force ever since the organization of this Government, applicable to these corporations established by your own laws. The general principle of the judiciary legislation of this country has been that rights accruing under the laws of the United States were cognizable in the courts of the United States; but it so happens that the general legislation of the country does not cover all classes of cases arising under the modern legislation by which you have invested large amounts of the public moneys and large quantities of the public lands in public improvements. I submit that the amendment proposed by me, and which has already been passed by the Senate without, as I understand, any objection, is entirely consistent with all our legislation, past and present.

I call the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the bill and amendments be laid on the table. I do not think it respectful to the Committee on the Judiciary that such a bill as this should be passed without a reference to that committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I disclaim any want of respect to the committee.

The motion of Mr. Ross was not agreed to; there being—ayes 13, noes 95.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment of Mr. BINGHAM was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move to amend the title of the bill by adding the words, "and for other purposes."

The amendment was agreed to.

JONATHAN S. TURNER.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was joint resolution (S. R. No. 147) for the relief of Jonathan S. Turner; which was read a first and second time.

The preamble recites that Jonathan S. Turner, of Fair Haven, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut, obtained letters-patent of the United States for an improvement in alarm-clocks, dated July 13, 1852; that he did, on or about the 27th day of December, 1865, file in the Patent Office his petition or application for an extension of the term, in accordance with the provisions of the eighteenth section of the patent act, approved July 4, 1836, and complied with all the requirements of the rules and laws applicable thereto, except the inadvertent omission of one revenue stamp of the value of five cents, for which omission only the acting Commissioner of Patents did, on the 12th day of July, 1866, refuse to extend the patent. The resolution proposes, therefore, to direct the Commissioner of Patents to extend the term of the patent for seven years from and after the 13th day of July, 1866. The patent so extended is to have the same validity, force, and effect as though the extension had been allowed and certified by the Commissioner of Patents, in accordance with the eighteenth section of the patent act, approved July 4, 1836, before the expiration of the original term.
